SEC. 15. That no contract for the use and occupancy as a dwelling of any building in any alley in the District of Columbia, the use of which building for dwelling purposes has been forbidden under authority of this act, shall be valid, nor shall any consideration of any kind be enforced or collected upon any such contract. And notwithstanding any agreement between the owner of any such building and the occupant thereof, it shall be lawful for said owner at any time to close it effectually against the ingress or egress of any and all persons occupying or attempting to occupy said premises for dwelling purposes.

SEC. 16. That the owner of each and every unoccupied building in the District of Columbia shall keep said building and all land and premises appurtenant thereto clean; in such repair as not to jeopardize the life, limb, or health of passers by, or of persons dwelling, doing business, or lawfully assembling in the vicinity, or of persons lawfully entering upon the premises; and in the case of buildings or inclosed yards, securely closed against entrance by persons not authorized by said owner to enter.

SEC. 17. That if the use as a place of dwelling of any alley in the District of Columbia has been prohibited, and the owner of any real property abutting on said alley and formerly occupied as a dwelling desires to transfer such property to the owner of adjacent land abutting on one of the streets or avenues bounding the square in which such alley is located, or desires himself to acquire title to such adjacent land, so as to make said alley property and said street property one continuous area; and if by reason of a public alley between the alley property and the street property said owner be prevented from doing so; then and in that event the Commissioners of said District may in their discretion sell, and they are hereby authorized so to do, to the owner of such alley property or of such street property so much of such public alley as may be necessary to permit the conversion of both into a single continuous tract, subject to such restrictions as in the judgment of said commissioners the public welfare may require, at a price per square foot not less than the mean between the assessed value per square foot of the land abutting upon the street and the land abutting upon the alley, which land the sale is designed to unite; and said commissioners are hereby authorized to execute in the name of the United States or in the name of the District of Columbia, as the circumstances may require, all such conveyances as may be necessary to convey a valid title to the purchaser, each conveyance so executed, however, to embody all such covenants as may be necessary to impose upon the land sold and upon the lots united by the sale of such land all such restrictions as have been determined upon by said commissioners: Provided, That no such sale of any part of a public alley shall be made unless in the judgment of said commissioners it can be made without interfering with the effectiveness of the alleys in said square for the service of all premises situated therein. And any money payable on account of the sale of any such part, or of the whole, of any public alley under the provisions of this act shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia and shall be by him deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or of both, as their respective interests may appear.

SEC. 18. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to report to Congress annually, and as much oftener as in their judgment may be expedient, the progress of their operations under this act, and to submit drafts of such further legislation, if any, as in their judgment may be necessary to carry into effect the true purpose and intent of this act within the time specified herein.

SEC. 19. That for the purposes of this act, the word "alley" shall be held to mean any thoroughfare, by whatsoever name it may be known, and whether public or private, the roadway of which is less than 30 feet wide in its narrowest place, measured in the most direct line, and the shortest distance between the building lines on the opposite sides of which is less than 40 feet, and which said thoroughfare does not run straight through and open directly upon a street, avenue, or road of dimensions not less than those herein specified. The word "dwelling" shall be held to mean any structure or part of any structure commonly occupied by one or more persons for sleeping purposes, and the occupying of any structure or part of a structure in the nighttime shall be prima facie evidence of occupying the same as a dwelling. A building shall be regarded as situated in an alley if the ordinary mode of ingress and egress of the occupants thereof is through an alley.

SEC. 20. That any notice required by this act to be served shall be deemed to have been served if delivered to the person to be notified, or if left at the usual residence or place of business of the person to be notified, with any person of suitable age and discretion then resident or employed therein; or if no such residence or place of business can be found in the District of Columbia by reasonable search, if left with any person of suitable age and discretion employed therein at the office of any agent of the person to be notified, which agent has any authority or duty whatsoever with reference to the real property to which said notice relates; or if no such office can be found in said District by reasonable search, if forwarded by registered mail to the last known address of the person to be notified and not returned by the post-office authorities; or if no address be known or can by reasonable diligence be ascertained, or if any notice forwarded as authorized by the preceding clause of this section is returned by the post-office authorities, then if published three times at intervals of five days in a daily newspaper of general circulation published in said District; or if by reason of an outstanding unrecorded transfer of title, the name of the owner in fact can not be ascertained beyond a reasonable doubt, if served on the owner of record in the manner hereinbefore in this section provided. Any notice to a corporation shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to have been served on such corporation if served on the president, secretary, treasurer, general manager, or any principal officer of said corporation in the manner hereinbefore provided for the service of notices on natural persons holding property in their own rights. Any notice to a foreign corporation shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to have been served if served on an agent of such corporation personally or if left with any person of suitable age and discretion residing at the usual residence or employed at the usual place of business of such agent in said District.

SEC. 21. That whenever the title to any premises or part of any premises in any alley in the District of Columbia the use of which as a place of dwelling is to be or has been forbidden under authority of this act is in litigation, the commissioners of said District shall notify all parties to the suit and through the corporation counsel of said District shall bring the circumstances to the attention of the court in which such litigation is pending, for the purpose of obtaining such orders or decrees as will enable said commissioners to continue such proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the use and occupancy of said building as a place for dwelling; and said court is hereby authorized to make such orders and decrees in such pending suit as may be necessary for that purpose.

SEC. 22. That whenever the title to any building or part of building is vested in a person non compos mentis, or a minor child or minor children without legal guardian, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall report that fact, through the corporation counsel, to the Supreme Court of said District and obtain the appointment of a guardian or guardians for such person non compos mentis, or minor child or children aforesaid, for the purpose of the proceedings authorized by this act. Any justice of the Supreme Court of said District, holding an equity court, is hereby authorized to appoint a guardian or guardians for that purpose.

SEC. 23. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act, or aiding or abetting in the violation thereof, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 24. That prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia, upon information signed by the corporation counsel of said District, or by one of his assistants.

SEC. 25. That all acts and parts of acts contrary to the provisions of this act or inconsistent therewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia to erect, place, or construct any dwelling on any lot or parcel of ground fronting on an alley where such alley is less than 30 feet wide throughout its entire length and which does not run straight to and open on two of the streets bordering the square, and is not supplied with sewer, water mains, and gas or electric light; and in this act the term "alley" shall include any and all courts, passages, and thoroughfares, whether public or private, and any ground intended for or used as a highway other than the public streets or avennes; and any dwelling house now fronting an alley less than 30 feet wide and not extending straight to the streets and provided with sewer, water main, and light, as aforesaid, which has depreciated or been damaged more than one-half its original value, shall not be repaired or reconstructed as a dwelling or for use as such, and no permit shall be issued for the alteration, repair, or reconstruction of such a building when the plans indicate any provision for dwelling purposes: Provided, That rooms for grooms or stablemen to be employed in the building to be erected, repaired, or reconstructed may be allowed over stables when the means of exit and safeguards against fire are sufficient, in the opinion of the inspector of buildings, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; and no building now or hereafter erected fronting on an alley or on any parcel of ground fronting on an alley less than 30 feet wide and not otherwise in accordance with this act shall be altered or converted to the uses of a dwelling. Any such alley house depreciated or damaged more than one-half of its original value shall be condemned as provided by law for the removal of dangerous or unsafe buildings and parts thereof, and for other purposes. No dwelling house hereafter erected or placed along any alley and fronting or facing thereon shall in any case be located less than 20 feet back clear of the center line of such alley, so as to give at least a 30-foot roadway and 5 feet on each side of such roadway clear for a walk or footway, and any stable or other building hereafter placed, located, altered, or erected on or along such an alley upon which a dwelling faces or fronts shall be set back clear of the walk or footway the same as the dwelling or dwellings, but the fact that dwellings are located in such alleys shall not affect the location of stables or other buildings otherwise.

"The use or occupation of any building or other structure erected or placed on or along any such alley as a dwelling or residence or place of abode by any person or persons is hereby declared injurious to life, to public health, morals, safety, and welfare of said District; and such use or occupation of any such building or other structure on, from, and after the 1st day of July, 1918, shall be unlawful.

"SEC. 2. That any person or persons, whether as principal, agent, or employee, violating any of the provisions of this act, or any amendment thereof, for the violation of which no other penalty is prescribed, shall, on conviction thereof in the police court, be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100 for each such violation and a like fine for each day during which such violation has continued or may continue, to be recovered as other fines and penalties are recovered.

"SEC. 3. That the act of Congress approved July 22, 1892, entitled 'An act regulating the construction of buildings along alleyways in the District of Columbia,' and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof, are hereby repealed."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, let the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be recognized for general debate?

Mr. MANN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose no one will disagree with the good people who desire to abolish the alley evil or to stop the use of improper dwellings, whether they be located upon alleys or streets. How much necessity there may be for legislation or improvement in this respect in the District of Columbia I would not pretend to know as well as some of those gentlemen who favor the provisions of this bill; but it seems to me that the House ought not hastily and without consideration to pass a bill that is sure to involve the Government in the payment of private claims for many years to come in some unknown but certainly large amounts. To-day we set aside temporarily the consideration of the plaza-award cases in order to take up this bill. Those are claims which people now have who say they can not get their money, not being legally entitled to it. I am not making any criticism of postponing the consideration of that bill to take this up, but it is an illustration of the fact that the Government is slow about paying those claims which are not legal claims. The Government is very prompt to pay legal claims.

The original bill in this case now before us, covering some 22 pages, carefully drawn, provided a method of ascertaining and paying the damages which would be inflicted upon the owners of private property by the proposed legislation.

What is the proposition? It is that an alley must be 30 feet wide before any dwelling can be placed upon it or anyone live in a house upon the alley. That is the general proposition. There are a good many alleys less than 30 feet wide which are used for dwellings in the city of Washington and a good many other cities. It used to be and still is a not unusual practice in the city from which I come for a man to buy a not very expensive lot and build a building upon the rear of the lot, on the alley, because he did not have the means to build a permanent home. In the course of time, as he accumulated a little more money or credit, he built a home on the front of the lot. Now, this bill proposes practically to seize all of the alley property in the District of Columbia, to abolish all the dwellings upon alleys in the District of Columbia, to forbid the erection of any dwelling hereafter upon any alley in the District of Columbia. When I say alley, it includes everything up to the width of 30 feet, including courts, private passageways, or any other form of highway. The original bill, introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, made provision for the payment of the damages, and provided that the District Commissioners might order the closing as a dwelling place of any alley; and if any claims for damages were made by the owners of the property there, then the District Commissioners should bring in all of the owners of property in the square, and a jury should be appointed who should assess the damages and the benefits, the purpose being to provide a method by which the damages to those owners whose property was practically taken away from them should be ascertained, and to assess the benefits to other property arising from the closing of the alley as a dwelling place.

I do not propose at this time to discuss fully the original bill, covering, as I say, 22 pages, which was endeavored to be carefully worked out so that for that property which we practically seized the owner should be compensated for the damage and the damage assessed upon the owners of the property benefited. But along comes the substitute reported by the committee—and I do not think the committee are to be charged with any responsibility in connection with the substitute. The committee found themselves where they desired to report as a substitute a bill in the exact language of the bill which has passed the Senate. But the substitute proposes practically to seize the property, to forbid its use, and to make no payment for the damages. Now, while we could not actually take the property of a private individual, under the Constitution, without at least being liable for its value, still we can through legislation destroy the value of property without any legal liability; but Congress is not a body which can destroy property without a moral liability, nor from my observation and experience do I think it is a body which can withstand or which ought to withstand the claims that will be made by those whose property is taken from them, to be recompensed by the General Treasury. The original bill provided that after the raising of money by special assessment on property which was benefited, if any excess of damage remained it should be paid, one-half out of the District treasury and one-half out of the Federal Treasury. The substitute, which makes no provision for the payment of claims at all, of course will result in the claims being brought before Congress for the entire amount to be paid out of the Federal Treasury. The whole theory of the original bill is the admission that damages will accrue to private owners of property located upon these alleys. The bill authorizes condemnation proceedings. It provides for the method of payment. For instance, in reference to the property which may be taken it says in one place:

That the amount assessed under this section as benefits shall be not less than one-half of the balance remaining after subtracting from the total damages as determined under the provisions of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, plus the cost of the condemnation proceedings, an amount equal to the value of all of the land acquired by the District of Columbia for subdivision into lots as hereinafter provided, the value of such land to be determined upon the basis of the amount awarded the owners thereof—

And so forth.

That is on page 3. I do not know what it means. I read it to myself a number of times and I could not tell what it meant. But I could see that it was intended to imply that there were damages to property and that it was intended to levy an assessment on property which was benefited.

Section 7 of the original bill provides:

That if the Commissioners of the District of Columbia agree with the owner of any building used as a dwelling at the time of the passage of this act and the use of which as a dwelling is forbidden by said commissioners pursuant to the provisions of said act, as to the fact that said building is substantially depreciated in value by reason of such prohibition and as to the extent of such depreciation—

And so forth. Here is a provision in the original bill prepared by the District Commissioners which plainly indicates that they knew that the prohibition of the use of dwellings would result in a marked depreciation of the value of the property. Who is to stand this under the substitute? Here is an admission in the original bill prepared by the District Commissioners that to forbid the use of a dwelling or the erection of a dwelling upon a court or alley is to depreciate the value of that property, or to forbid the use of a dwelling already erected is to depreciate the value of the property. Since when is Congress morally authorized to seize a man's property without any provision for the payment of the damages? The original bill, it is true, carries a method for ascertaining the damage and for paying the damage. It authorizes the owner or owners of any building, under any law in the District of Columbia, the use of which as a place of dwelling is prohibited under the provisions of this act, which said building was at the time of such prohibition used for dwelling purposes within six months of the date of the order of prohibition, if he was in the first instance served with notice of the issue of such order, and otherwise within one year after instituting the prohibition, to proceed in the Supreme Court in the District for the determination of the damages, and said building resulting from the prohibition of its further use as a dwelling and for the award of judgment against the District for the amount of damages.

It authorizes each of the owners separately to commence suit, or it authorizes the total number of owners in any one alley to join in a suit, and then authorizes the commissioners to make all the other owners of the property in the block codefendants. Then, when an answer is filed, it authorizes the appointment of a jury and the taking of testimony to determine the amount of the damages and to assess the benefits.

The whole theory of the original bill—and you will pardon me for reiterating it, but I wish to impress it upon you—the whole theory of the original bill is based on the idea that the prohibition in the use of these buildings and dwellings was a damage to the property and a loss to the owner, for which he was entitled to be paid, and it provided a method of raising the money with which to pay it. That is the original bill.

The whole theory of the substitute is that by our fiat we say that a man hereafter can not use his property fronting upon an alley 30 feet wide for the construction of any building where a person can live, and that after four years from now no building now used as a dwelling upon any alley shall be used for that purpose. We make no provision for the payment to the owner of the damage caused to him by the depreciation of his property on account of our fiat. I do not believe in seizing private property without recompense for it. I do not believe in destroying the value of property without recompense for it. I do not believe in doing something which we know will bring before Congress claims for large sums of money, claims necessary to recompense the owners of property whose property has been depreciated by our fiat. I do not believe we ought to enter into it as a wholesale scheme. The original bill would have authorized the District Commissioners to take up one alley in one block where conditions were bad, stop the use there of dwellings as dwellings, and go block by block, as it chose. There you could determine before you went too far what the damage was and what the cost was.

The substitute bill covers all alleys, all courts, all passageways, all highways of any kind at one fell swoop which are less than 30 feet wide.

One gentleman, referring to the substitute bill, said that he did not take it too seriously, because he thought it had so many holes in it that the first property owner who brought a suit to enjoin would be successful, and the bill would be thrown out of court. I am not so sure of that, nor do I think it is desirable to enact legislation upon the theory that the first time you try to put it into effect somebody will have it declared unconstitutional.

But in order that the House may know what it is, let us see what the provisions of the substitute are. It provides that after the passage of the act it shall be unlawful in the District to construct—I do not read the language exactly as it occurs, but in substance—to construct any dwelling on any lot fronting on an alley where the alley is less than 30 feet wide through its entire length, where the alley does not run straight through from one street to another, and where the alley is not supplied with sewer, water main, and gas or electric light. And it provides that the term "alley" shall include any and all courts, passages, and thoroughfares, whether public or private, and any ground intended for or used as a highway other than the public streets or avenues. Of course, one of the first things that one will have to construe there is when a parcel of ground—and that is one of the terms used—fronts on an alley, because it will become patent that if a man has an automobile drive by the side of his house, going to a garage in the rear of his house—and that is covered by the terms of this bill in the definition of the term "alley"—it is not the purpose of the bill to prohibit him from erecting a house alongside of his private driveway; and yet the terms of the bill would do that. Of course it is to be presumed that a sensible judge, acting in a sensible court, would not construe the law in that way in such a case, but I doubt whether he would be able to draw the line between that case that I have mentioned and a case where property is actually desired for a dwelling upon a real alley.

Another provision of the bill allows rooms to be provided for grooms or stablemen—

Provided, That rooms for grooms or stablemen to be employed in the building to be erected, repaired, or reconstructed may be allowed over stables, when the means of exit and safeguards against fire are sufficient, in the opinion of the inspector of buildings, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

One would suppose from that that it was the intention to permit a barn to be erected upon the alley provided with a room where a groom or stableman might live or at least stay at night. The intention undoubtedly is expressed to allow them to have the rooms there, but almost the next paragraph of the bill provides that the use or occupation of any building on or along any such alley as a dwelling or residence or place of abode by any person is declared to be injurious, and from and after the 1st day of July shall be unlawful. Having provided in the bill that a man in erecting a barn might provide rooms for his stableman or groom, the bill next provides that it shall be unlawful to occupy those rooms. There can be no escape from that proposition.

I do not know who drew this substitute. It provides that upon an alley more than 30 feet wide you may erect a dwelling, placing it so that it will be at least 20 feet from the center of the alley in order to provide a 5-foot sidewalk space; a very proper and suitable provision, though it is not required that that sidewalk space shall exist as to any building already upon the alley, and there will be therefore no uniformity. And then it provides that the occupation of a building on such an alley—that is, an alley that is 30 feet wide upon which a building may be erected as a dwelling—is declared to be injurious as to life, health, public morals, and everything else that you can think of. It has been so long since I practiced law that I have doubt as to my legal fame, but I would like to get some lawyer to construe this language. The language is:

The use or occupation of any building or other structure erected or placed on or along any such alley as a dwelling or residence or place of abode by any person or persons is hereby declared injurious to life, to public health, morals, safety, and welfare of said District; and such use or occupation of any such building or other structure on, from, and after the 1st day of July, 1918, shall be unlawful.

What does the expression "such alley" refer to? The last description of an alley in the bill is an alley 30 feet wide upon which dwellings may be erected, and having said that upon an alley 30 feet wide a dwelling may be erected, the bill then provides that the occupation of a dwelling upon such an alley is declared to be injurious to life and health.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does that language appear in the amended bill or in the original bill?

Mr. MANN. This is in the substitute, which I am now discussing.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGUE. On page 23 it provides for a 20-foot distance from the center line. Would not that practically require a 40-foot street or alley there?

Mr. MANN. Yes; it would as to any new dwelling.

Mr. LOGUE. Because it requires a 5-foot way to be on both sides.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. And establishes a center line 20 feet from the house line.

Mr. MANN. Yes. I do not think that is objectionable.

Mr. LOGUE. No; but I just wanted enlightenment to see if we understood the matter the same.

Mr. MANN. That is, the alley that is 30 feet wide. When you build upon it you must leave 5 feet on each side, making it 40 feet. It authorizes a building upon such an alley, and in the next paragraph says that you can not occupy the building upon such an alley.

Mr. LOGUE. Then, commencing at the top of page 24, the restriction as to use clearly relates over to the last—that which the gentleman last described.

Mr. MANN. Well, it did in the days when I practiced law. It does yet, as far as my legislative experience goes. Where you use "such," without any further definition, you do not step over the last 40 pages and jump back to the first page. When you have a number of descriptions of the word "such," it relates to the last description. That is plainly what this does. Then it goes on—having authorized the erection of a dwelling on such an alley—it goes on and says that the use or occupation of any such building shall be unlawful. Now, of course, as I say, it may be one gets solace out of the idea that this bill is so unartificially drawn that it will not hold in court, but I do not think that is a safe proposition to go on. Here is a feature of the bill that is not at all serious—that it is indicating the frame of the mind of the gentleman who drew it. I would not make this remark if my friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] drew it, but I know he did not. Section 2 says—

That any person or persons, whether as principal or agent or employee, violating any of the provisions of this act or any amendment thereof,

Here is an original act that has not yet been passed. It is perfectly proper to put in a provision making a penalty for a violation of the act, but here is the putting in of a penalty for some act which may not be passed for 50 years to come. Whoever drew it had a brilliant imagination. He not only made it a violation of existing law, but he made it a violation of the proposed law, and then he has made it a violation of some amendments to the proposed law. There is one thing quite definite: The gentleman who drew this and put in a provision to make it a violation for any amendment of this act had a very clear conception of one thing, and that was that it was so poorly drawn it would need amendment at an early day. I have no objection to the passage of a proper bill in reference to the alley matter, but I think if we provide that the property of the District of Columbia shall be so guarded that dwellings shall not be erected or used upon alleys, and existing property is damaged thereby, that the District of Columbia ought to pay the expenses of the benefit which accrues to the District of Columbia. If it is no benefit to the District of Columbia, if it is no advantage to the District of Columbia, the legislation ought not to be enacted; but if it is to benefit the property in the District of Columbia and wipe out the alley slums, charges should be made against the District of Columbia, and not leave it to claims hereafter to be brought against the Federal Treasury. It has not been difficult, and it never will be difficult, to influence the Claims Committee of this House by personal appeals—that is human nature; and I am not criticizing the Claims Committee—and there never has been a time when a whole lot of people, or one person, even where they follow around from one member of the Claims Committee to another—and it is not necessary to confine it entirely to the Claims Committee—but what you get the favorable action of the committee.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. LOGUE. What is the gentleman's thought as regards the proposition of benefits to be assessed against the adjacent owners when we are dealing with a general public improvement which relates to general public morals and general public health? Should there be any attempt to assess benefits against adjacent property owners?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I can very readily see in a particular case in a block where there is an alley that runs through there may be some cheap property upon the alley sites which damages the entire block and that you might properly abolish the use of these buildings as dwellings, and because of the enhanced value which would come to the balance of the property you might assess the amount of damages against the other property as a benefit that would be in a particular block. Of course, where the benefits are general throughout the city, the law of special assessments does not permit the assessment to be levied against the particular piece of property because there is no special benefit.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman has probably noticed in the original bill, known as the commissioners' bill, there is one provision for assessing against the adjoining property the actual benefits found by a jury.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BORLAND. If any benefits actually accrue, the joint property owners could be assessed.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I thought I had stated that, but the gentleman has stated it more clearly than I did.

If we make no provision for the payment of the claim—you and I know perfectly well that if John Jones has a dwelling down here and we take it away from him, even though we take it away legally, he will come before Congress in the hands of a claim agent and ask us to pay the damage, and in order to make it sure he will probably make the damage two or three times what it really is. We have no method of ascertaining the facts, and he stays around the committee and sees the Members of Congress. While one person can not do all of this all of the time, when there are hundreds there is no difficulty in doing it, and in the end the claim is reported to the House. While there are times when claims have rocky roads to travel in the House, because of the ease with which they are reported out, we pay and will continue to pay large sums of money for claims, and in cases of this kind I think we ought to pay.

Even I would not be opposed, and I am not enthusiastic about claims against the Government, to the principle, at least, that if you destroy a man's property, of paying damage which accrues to him by reason of the legislation which we enact. I do not think the substitute bill ought to pass. There are provisions in the original bill which I do not like. I do not believe that the District of Columbia Commissioners should be given the power, as is given in the original bill, to buy property in order to resubdivide it and sell it. I should doubt whether they were qualified real-estate agents, to begin with, but up to the present time I do not think there is any need in this city, or probably in this country, for the Government to go into the business of subdividing lots for sale.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman wish to yield on that point?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 41 minutes.

Mr. MANN. All right; I will yield.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is familiar with the geographical situation of some of these alleys, and knows that the interior of the block is divided into a number of small alleys, sometimes in an egg shape and sometimes in an "S" shape, and if the provisions of this bill were carried out and a 30-foot alley carried clear from street to street, it probably would have the effect in many cases of leaving small lots in the inside of those alleys, that we can not now use for any purpose unless the alleys are replatted and resubdivided, and there were lots of sufficient wideness on each side of the street.

Mr. MANN. I was about to say that I was not certain, but there might be cases where we might give power to the commissioners within proper limitations in order to eradicate small alleys in this city.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, Washington is not only unusually laid out in streets, squares, and alleys, but the building up of the squares has been done in a very unusual way. Some years ago I heard the question of Willow Tree Alley brought up for discussion on this floor. At that time my attention had never been invited as to what an alley in the city of Washington was. I jumped at the conclusion that an alley in Washington was like an alley in any other of the cities of the country—that it was a little street, or alley, 10 feet wide, running through a square. But when the subject of Willow Tree Alley came up I learned that there are a number of squares in Washington—and that is one of them—where the entire outside of the square was built up, leaving a court on the inside of the square, and that, in local parlance, or in the description of an alley in the city of Washington, a court is an alley. On the inside of the square where that court existed—speaking now of Willow Tree Alley—there were a lot of miserable huts and shanties. It was a dirty, filthy place, breeding all sorts of crime and disease. Congress sought to wipe that out, and it was done, at a cost of something like several hundred thousand dollars, although I do not remember the exact figure. There are many more of just such places as that in Washington. They had better be described as courts than alleys, but they have come to be known in the city of Washington as alleys. There has been a desire, running way back, to do away with those inner courts or alleys, for the reason, as I said, that it is next to impossible to control them with the police. The worst characters who come to town congregate there; and, as I said a moment ago, it is but a breeding place for crime and all sorts of disease.

Back in 1892 Congress realized that some of these places, at least the worst of them, must be gotten rid of, and passed an act, which I shall read. It is short. It says:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful to erect or place a dwelling house on or along any alley in the District of Columbia where such alley is less than 30 feet wide and is not supplied with sewerage, water mains, and light: Provided, That no dwelling house hereafter erected or placed in any alley shall in any case be located less than 20 feet back clear of the center line of such alley, so as to give at least a 30-foot roadway and 5 feet on each side of such roadway clear for a walk or footway; and that it shall be unlawful to erect or place a dwelling house on or along any alley which does not run straight to and open at right angles upon one of the public streets bordering the square in which such alley is located, with at least one exit 15 feet in the clear.

That act was approved on July 22, 1892.

Mr. HARDY. At least one what of 15 feet?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. One exit. Congress passed another act relative to the same subject, which can be found in the Statutes at Large of the United States, volume 27, pages 254 and 255, and that act was made part of the building regulations of the District of Columbia. That act, in substance, provides that when a building in one of these alleys has deteriorated to the extent of 50 per cent it can not be repaired. In that way a great many of the alley houses have been dispensed with as residences, because they have deteriorated to a degree greater than 50 per cent of their value, and in that way were closed up.

The present bill was introduced by me upon the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I have no knowledge as to who drafted the bill. The District Committee, in coming to consider what is now known as the commissioners' bill, or what may be better termed the House bill, reported it out with a substitute, that substitute being in the exact language of the bill which the Senate has passed and which is now upon the Speaker's table. I wish to impress the committee with the fact that the substitute for this bill is exactly the bill which the Senate has passed. I ask to impress that because a number of gentlemen have asked me to-day what was the difference between the substitute for this bill and the Senate bill. If you will notice, if you will compare the Senate bill with what I have just read, being the act of July 22, 1892, you will see they are very similar, indeed. There is one great difference between them, however, in this: The original act of 1892 did not make any provision for doing away with these alley slums, except as they would deteriorate in value. The Senate bill which is now the substitute for the House bill does away with all these alleys by the year 1918, or, in other words, it gives four years in which to prepare and meet the situation which will then exist if this bill passes.

This bill, which has passed the Senate and which we have made a substitute for the House bill, is based upon the police power. The bill is all based upon the police power, and therefore we have reached the conclusion, in reporting it out, that the bill is constitutionally good. If there were any question in the mind of anybody on this floor as to whether the bill is constitutionally good, I entertain not the slightest doubt that the constitutional question would be raised by the property holders who seek to continue their investment in this miserable class of property, which brings a rental higher in per cent than any other property in the District of Columbia. So the effect of the difference between the present law and that which is contemplated by the substitute for the House bill, which is the Senate bill, is to do away with these alley buildings for residential purposes at an earlier date than under the act of 1892, which I have just read.

There is no desire to destroy this property, and there is nothing in this bill which will warrant the belief that this property is to be affected in any way other than for residential purposes. There have been, and I guess there will continue to be, objections to the House bill upon the ground that it seeks to sell a nuisance to the United States Government. It is contended that elsewhere in the country these nuisances are condemned under the police power. That leaves the property to its owners, to be used in any lawful way they choose to use it except as a residence, it being contended and maintained that a residence in these places can not be lawfully used; that nobody except unlawful characters will go into these places; that unlawful characters seek these places because they are free from police regulation.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield the floor if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] desires to move that the committee rise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] be permitted to speak for 10 minutes on a subject foreign to this bill.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of no quorum present.

Mr. BORLAND. I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of no quorum, and the gentleman from Missouri yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, on August 24, 1814, 100 years ago to-day, the city of Washington was occupied by a British army under the command of Maj. Gen. Robert Ross, and some men of the British Navy under the direction of a British admiral. They set fire to and burned the public buildings of the Capital. According to British historians, this was done in retaliation for the destruction of a public building at York, in Canada, by the Americans a year before. Gen. Ross found raiding to be a dangerous business, for he lost his life in the attack on Baltimore a few days after the capture of Washington.

In accordance with the practice of monarchical governments the family of Gen. Ross were signally honored for this exploit. The Prince Regent of England conferred upon his descendants the honor and distinction of adding the words "of Bladensburg" to the family name, and augmenting the coat of arms of the family to perpetuate the memory of the Battle of Bladensburg. The augmentation consisted of putting upon the coat of arms "a wreath of laurel, the hand grasping a flagstaff broken in bend sinister, therefrom flowing the colors of the United States of America."

The village of Bladensburg, 8 miles from Washington, never was a fortress. It is probably no larger now than it was a hundred years ago. A great share of the population seems to be negroes living in dilapitated shanties built before the American Revolution. When the British forces appeared some drafted militia, consisting largely of Government clerks, and accompanied by a few marines, undertook to defend Washington, which was then a town of but 9,000 inhabitants, surrounded by a wilderness. The militia fled before the approach of the regular forces; the marines stood their ground until outflanked, and then retreated. In this encounter the Americans lost just 26 killed and 52 wounded. And this was all that happened at Bladensburg 100 years ago to-day.

The grandson of Maj. Gen. Ross still occupies the ancestral home at Rostrevor, a few miles from Belfast, in Ireland, and still triumphantly displays the American flag on his coat-of-arms. He styles himself, according to his inherited right, Sir John Ross-of-Bladensburg, not omitting the two hyphens. He holds a position connected with the police force of Dublin.

Placing the flag of the United States and the word "Bladensburg" on the coat of arms of this distinguished family could not have been done in token of a great victory; the evident purpose was to humiliate the American people. The theory was that the escutcheon of the house of Ross would boast while we mourned—that the descendants of the general should fall heir to glory while we should inherit chagrin.

How strange all of this seems to the common sense of the American citizen! We have no coats of arms labeled "Saratoga," "Yorktown," "Lake Champlain," or "New Orleans." If we had, how could we look at each other without smiling? How fortunate it is that we have not sought to keep alive the spirit of war and aggression. We are not burning with revenge for lost battles nor lost Provinces. The descendants of our heroes can make no claim on the public esteem on account of anything done by their ancestors. If this Congress were controlled by men who might style themselves the "Duke of Bunker Hill," the "Earl of Stony Point," the "Lord of Lake Erie," or the "Prince of Louisiana," the chances are that they would owe it to their native pride to revenge every humiliation upon the children of the enemies of their ancestors.

The past has little meaning where men are free. If the ordinary American citizen were asked who won any of the battles of the War of 1812, he would probably refer the matter to some teacher of history, especially if he were a busy and useful citizen. He would probably fail to recollect, if he ever knew, that Tecumseh, chief of the Shawnees, was a brigadier general in the British Army. Yet this was exactly the title and commission of Tecumseh. Tecumseh is entitled to a page in history. He fell gallantly in battle in defense of his native forest and for what he believed to be the rights of his people. Descendants of Col. Johnson, who slew Tecumseh at the Battle of the Thames, are around us, innocent of "the boast of heraldry or the pomp of power."

It is possible that Americans have overdone the matter of talking over the progress of the past century. We had fondly hoped that war would become a thing of the past among civilized nations, but we hoped in vain. The progress that we have observed, that strikes us most forcibly on this centennial day, is that that former ally of Tecumseh has become the partner of the Czar of Russia and the Mikado of Japan in the enterprise of crushing a nation in which half of the scientific work of the world is done. How fortunate that we do not nurse ancient wrongs nor inherit the passions of our ancestors! If we did, Washington would be a more interesting spot to-day than it was a hundred years ago.

Far from discussing war or rumors of war, the House of Representatives of the United States is wrestling with the problem of irrigating the public lands in the semiarid regions of the West. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], always for economy and jealously guarding the Public Treasury, argues that money derived from public lands should go into the Treasury for general purposes and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], with the pioneer spirit, is contending that the money should be placed in the reclamation fund and that a part of it should be used for the maintenance of schools in the Western States. The House is planning to make homes for the people in the west half of the United States, where every square mile is a health resort and where a half million square miles of the most fertile land in the world still remain untouched. We are attempting the conquest of nature, and we have no thought of the conquest of men. The American people stand aghast at the butchery now in progress in the harvest fields of northern Europe—a harvest, but not of sheaves. So far from arousing the slumbering war spirit it has, on the contrary, given to the name of peace a more significant and holy meaning than it ever had before. We shall go on and plan for homes for the people. Let us provide a chance for men to live instead of a chance to die. [Applause.] We can not stop the European struggle. In the words of the distinguished countryman of Gen. Ross, we stand aloof and silent "with the undissembled homage of deferential horror." [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to make a few observations upon the political and business conditions of the country under a Democratic administration; but time forbids, and therefore I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object to this request, but unless the majority side of the House soon gives some opportunity for Members of the minority and the majority to discuss political questions in Committee of the Whole, I shall object to all such requests.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think my distinguished friend from Illinois will agree with me that I do not take much time in talking, nor do I object to that side of the House having their innings.

Mr. MANN. No; but we have a rule operating under which it is said that no man can speak on political questions, and we did not vote for the rule. Now, if you people on the other side insist upon passing such rules, and then will not give us a chance to speak in debate on political questions, I am not going to let you print.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few observations on the political and business conditions of the country under a Democratic administration, showing actual results.

Two years have elapsed since the national convention of the Democratic Party met in Baltimore, nominated candidates for President and Vice President, and adopted a platform. It is time to look over the situation and see if the promises then made have been kept. A party, like an individual, must be judged by deeds, not words. Applying this inexorable test to the Democrats, let us see what has been the result.

The platform in its first plank on tariff reform declared as follows:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of government honestly and economically administered.

The high Republican tariff is the principal cause of the unequal distribution of wealth. It is a system of taxation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. Under its operations the American farmer and laboring man are the chief sufferers. It raises the cost of the necessaries of life to them, but does not protect their product or wages. The farmer sells largely in free markets and buys almost entirely in the protected markets. In the most highly protected industries, such as cotton and wool, steel and iron, the wages of the laborers are the lowest paid in any of our industries. We denounce the Republican pretense on that subject and assert that American wages are established by competitive conditions and not by the tariff.

We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high and in many cases prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reductions be speedily made upon the necessaries of life. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles of American manufacture which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.

In fulfillment of this pledge Congress during 1913 passed a just and equitable tariff law that is working out splendidly to the benefit of the consumer. It is in the interest of the masses, and has reduced the cost of building material, clothing, and many of the necessaries of life.

Congress has also passed a wise currency law to take the place of the old worn-out system that encouraged and brought about financial depressions and panics. The new act will prevent these disasters and enable the business of the country to be properly and successfully handled. Under its wise and elastic provisions there can be no cornering of money or credit, nor of the products of the farm, the forest, the mills, or the other activities of the people.

The third important plank in the platform read as follows:

ANTITRUST LAW.

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

The three bills on this subject recently passed completely cover these vexed questions and will work out for the good of the people, proving of incalculable benefit to the country. The interests and combinations will no longer control business to the injury of the people.

In the adoption of an income tax, a wise and just system of taxation, not only has another platform pledge been fulfilled, but the Congress performed a great service to the people. By this law the support of the Government is equitably distributed, and those with large incomes are for the first time in its history called on to contribute their fair share and properly aid in bearing the burdens. Upward of one hundred millions has been paid into the United States Treasury in 1914 from this source, that hitherto escaped taxation. As the years go on this sum will materially increase, thus reducing the burdens in other directions.

In the plank affecting railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines the Congress, largely Democratic, has faithfully lived up to the following, which appeared in the party's platform:

We favor the efficient supervision and rate regulation of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines engaged in interstate commerce. To this end we recommend the valuation of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines by the Interstate Commerce Commission, such valuation to take into consideration the physical value of the property, the original cost, the cost of reproduction, and any element of value that will render the valuation fair and just.

We favor such legislation as will effectually prohibit the railroads, express, telegraph, and telephone companies from engaging in business which brings them into competition with their shippers or patrons, also legislation preventing the overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines, and legislation which will assure such reductions in transportation rates as conditions will permit, care being taken to avoid reduction that would compel a reduction of wages, prevent adequate service, or do injustice to legitimate investments.

In the several other planks, notably those dealing with the rights of labor, pure food and public health, civil service, pensions, and so forth, the Democratic Party, through the President and its Representatives in Congress, has lived up to its promises and kept faith with the people.

To the wise and patriotic policy of President Wilson war with Mexico was averted. For this humane and statesmanlike result his administration is entitled to the commendation of every American, aye, of the people of all nations. With this record and its splendid history of more than a century the Democratic Party appeals to the suffrages of the whole people, regardless of political affiliations. President Wilson's administration has merited a vote of confidence and, unless all signs fail, will be supported by the return of a Democratic Congress in November. His entire administration, covering a period of less than 18 months, has been a safe, sane one, characterized by honesty of purpose and a high order of patriotism. I am gratified that I have had some part in these achievements. My best efforts have been put forth to further the platform of the Democratic Party, its traditions, and to uphold the hands of President Wilson and his splendid Cabinet, of which the whole country may feel proud.

The Congress which will end March 4, 1915, and be succeeded by the Sixty-fourth, has under the leadership of Speaker CLARK and Leader UNDERWOOD done splendid service to the country. It has been one of economy and efficiency, working in season and out without intermission since it was organized, April 7, 1913. Its record will go down in history as one of the best since the foundation of the Government. In conclusion I desire to quote a few paragraphs from the President's patriotic and timely address to the American people on the European war crisis recently issued and to commend the same to my countrymen:

I venture, therefore, my fellow countrymen, to speak a solemn word of warning to you against that deepest, most subtle, most essential breach of neutrality which may spring out of partisanship, out of passionately taking sides. The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action, must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.

My thought is of America. I am speaking, I feel sure, the earnest wish and purpose of every thoughtful American that this great country of ours, which is, of course, the first in our thoughts and in our hearts, should show herself in this time of peculiar trial a nation fit beyond others to exhibit the fine poise of undisturbed judgment, the dignity of self-control, the efficiency of dispassionate action; a nation that neither sits in judgment upon others nor is disturbed in her own counsels and which keeps herself fit and free to do what is honest and disinterested and truly serviceable for the peace of the world.

Shall we not resolve to put upon ourselves the restraints which will bring to our people the happiness and the great and lasting influence for peace we covet for them?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WINGO, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13219) to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys in the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what it is he wants to put in the RECORD?

Mr. DEITRICK. This is an article written by Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, and in the article are discussed Congress, President Taft, and President Wilson.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to both sides of the House, I do not think we ought to allow these articles to be inserted.

Mr. DEITRICK. This is my first offense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] objects.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, unless some other gentleman has already attended to it, I will ask unanimous consent for a print of the Senate war insurance risk bill (S. 6357). It has not been printed since it was amended and passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that there be a print of the war insurance bill—S. 6357.

Mr. ADAMSON. As it passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Why has it not been printed?

Mr. ADAMSON. It came over to the House and was left on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. Why was it left on the Speaker's table?

Mr. ADAMSON. Because I hoped that the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen would consent to taking up the bill and considering it.

Mr. MANN. If the bill is referred it can be printed.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not ask for its reference.

Mr. MANN. I do; I ask that it be referred.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ABSENT MEMBERS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a few Members of the House have been here continuously all summer. A number of others have been here a greater portion of the time. There are a large number of Members of the House who have been almost continuously absent. I sympathize with Members who have work at home, the exigencies of whose campaign will cause them sometimes to stay there, but I think it goes without saying that undoubtedly some Members of this House have been neglecting their duty and putting undue burdens on those who remain here.

I desire to make a motion to-night, if there is no objection to its being made at this time; if there is objection, I will let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman from Alabama makes his motion I want to say that I shall object to any further business to-night. Those of us who stay here all summer I think have a right to quit the session of the House at 5 o'clock, and it is now half past 5. I will ask the gentleman to let the matter go over until to-morrow. There is no quorum here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I recognize that there is not a quorum present. But I desire to move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to notify the absentees of the House to return to Washington, and of course that is a motion that can not be put through without a quorum. If there is objection at this time, I will let it go over until to-morrow morning.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HAGUE CONVENTIONS (H. DOC. NO. 1151).

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

House resolution 593 (H. Rept. 1109).

Resolved, That there be printed as a House document 5,000 copies of The Hague conventions of 1889 and 1907, as printed in Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols, and Agreements Between the United States and Other Powers, 1776 to 1909, Malloy, volume 2, pages 2016 to 2057 and 2220 to 2389, published in the year 1910 by the Government Printing Office, the same to be distributed through the House folding room.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to ask the gentleman whether the committee considered at the same time the printing of the naval conference of 1909, in which the great powers were parties, and which passed upon more questions of importance than were debated at The Hague conference of 1907?

Mr. BARNHART. No; because that was not contained in the bill. The committee only considered the bill before it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The matter I refer to is of much more importance than the proceedings at The Hague convention.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will introduce a bill asking to have that printed, the committee will consider it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in view of what is now taking place in the world, I take it that the proposition to print the proceedings of The Hague conference is intended as a sort of legislative sarcasm.

Mr. BARNHART. I would hardly think that. I think even at this time, Mr. Speaker, the more sentiment for peace this country can promulgate and disseminate the better it will be for us.

Mr. MANN. If there is at present any useless bit of theory, it is the proceedings of The Hague conference.

Mr. BARNHART. And yet, Mr. Speaker, there may come out of it much good for posterity.

Mr. MANN. I hope so; but I am afraid it will be for posterity.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE IN ENGLAND.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

House resolution 546 (H. Rept. 1110).

Resolved, That there be printed 40,000 copies, to be placed in the House document room for the use of the House of Representatives, of the report of the Committee on Reform in Legal Procedure of the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology, appointed to investigate and make a study of criminal procedure in England, known as Senate Document No. 495, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

Mr. MANN. Who introduced this resolution?

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. MANN. What is the idea of placing 40,000 copies in the document room?

Mr. BARNHART. For the reason that it is believed that the lawyers in the Congress and others who are interested will go there and get these documents and send them out. If they are sent to the folding room, it was the opinion of the committee that the probability is they would lie there like many other documents do. But Mr. HARRISON assured the committee——

Mr. MANN. Oh, HARRISON is a good fellow, and I am willing that he should have 40,000 copies.

Mr. BARNHART. He assured the committee that he would notify each Member of the House that the documents are there.

Mr. STAFFORD. We had recently a reprint of the judicial code placed at our disposition. All of us, I presume, sent them to the lawyers in our respective districts. The gentleman knows that we are not going to get hold of this report; that they will be gobbled up before we can get them.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman will get a letter, upon the honor of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that he will notify him and every other Member when the document is ready, and they will not be gobbled up.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman knows the rapacity of some Members.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 42 (H. Rept. 1111).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,100 copies of the journal of the Forty-eighth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, for the year 1914, not to exceed $1,600 in cost; 100 to be bound in cloth, balance in paper covers.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 6, after the word "cost," by inserting a period and striking out the remainder of line 6 and all of line 7.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARNHART, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several resolutions were passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 25, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an item of legislation for incorporation in an appropriation bill, as follows: "Provided, That the payment for rent of offices heretofore used in the District of Columbia for the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications and the payments heretofore made for rent of such offices are hereby authorized" (H. Doc. No. 1150), was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8013) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Rogers, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1105), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1880) for the relief of Chester D. Swift, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1106), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2304) for the relief of Chris Kuppler, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1107), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Minnesota (by request): A bill (H. R. 18499) granting an honorably discharged veteran of the Civil War who held a place in the public service under the civil-service laws a monthly allowance equal to one-half his monthly pay, provided he has been removed from the service; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 25, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, amid the cares and responsibilities of to-day we need "that wisdom which is from above, that is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and of good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." In the consideration of all our plans may we be strengthened and directed by Thy divine influences. May these men of the Senate be inspired by those lofty ideals which make for righteousness and that emanate from Thy throne. We ask it in Christ's name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Saturday, August 22, 1914, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD AND CARNEGIE FOUNDATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, stating, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, that the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation have no relation to the work of the Navy Department; there are no employees of the department whose salaries are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation, and there are no administrative officers of the department connected in any way with the work of the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation. The communication will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 24, 1914.

Mr. JAMES M. BAKER,
Secretary United States Senate.

SIR: Replying to resolution of the Senate dated August 5, 1914, requesting and directing that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor furnish to the Senate certain information in regard to relation, if any, of the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation to the work of their respective departments, etc., I have to inform you that it is found, after investigation, that the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation have no relation to the work of the Navy Department; there are no employees of the department whose salaries are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation, and there are no administrative officers of the department connected in any way with the work of the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of 1,100 copies of the Journal of the Forty-eighth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1914, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Labor Council of Greater New York, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANTIWAR PROCLAMATION.

The Labor Council of Greater New York, representing organized labor, calls upon the Government of this country to act most vigorously against a continuation of the mad carnage which now soaks Europe with blood and increases the sufferings of the people all over the world.

To an already existing industrial depression further depression has been added. Curtailment of industries goes on more than before. Wages go down. Prices of life's necessities soar skyward. For vast numbers of working people life is becoming literally impossible. The so-called "life" of the workers is degenerating into a mean scramble for a miserable existence.

We refuse to tolerate these chaotic conditions any longer. We demand that the Government of this country, for the protection of its people and for the sake of humanity, reason, and civilization, employ all means at its disposal to end the ignominious tragedy which by a small group of irresponsible tyrants is being perpetrated on humanity.

We demand particularly that the Government rigidly enforce neutrality of the United States of America, and that the Government at once proceed to check the eagerness and effrontery with which our industrial and commercial masters watch for an opportunity to ship provisions and possibly other contraband of war to the warring nations, thus in their lust for profits, in their insatiable and criminal greed, preparing themselves to violate international law. We warn the Government of this country that we shall have no patience with these vultures, which belong to the same brand of fiends as those who instigated the European war. We demand that no commodity whatever shall directly nor indirectly be exported from this country to the warring nations until they cease hostilities and submit to arbitration. And we consider such a policy, when applied in conjunction with other measures, to be a formidable means at the disposal of the Government of this country to bring about peace.

THE LABOR COUNCIL OF GREATER NEW YORK,
MATTHEW FUERBTY, President.
FRED FISENER, Financial Secretary.
ANTON NEBEL, Treasurer.

In session August 14, 1914.

Mr. THORNTON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Elton, Jennings, and Cloverdale, in the State of Louisiana, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES. I have here two telegrams, and I desire to read one of them. It is as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., August 21, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In the name of the business organizations and commercial interests of Seattle we urge you to earnestly and determinedly oppose the Clayton bill in its present form. Its definitions are not helpful, but hurtful; their ambiguity and uncertainty make it more difficult to determine rightful business conduct. The provisions making it lawful for labor organizations to do that which is wrong and criminal when done by any other citizen alone or in combination is unjust and denial of equal protection of the law and subversive of social order. The provision for trial by jury in contempt cases reduces our Federal courts to mere boards of arbitration and will bring chaos into a vast field of business litigation. Moreover, irrespective of its merit, our business facing a most critical situation in finance and industry produced by foreign war ought not now to be asked to further adjust itself to experimental and revolutionary regulation, nor do we believe that our legislators or the country are in a frame of mind to give this important subject the careful and exhaustive consideration which it deserves. From careful observation, we believe this to express the business opinion of our section without respect to party.

SEATTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
J. E. CHILBERG, President.
THOMAS BURKE,
Chairman National Affairs Committee.

I have also another telegram, from Hon. J. M. Frink, president of the Washington Iron Works, of substantially the same character, but closing as follows:

Do something to encourage the small manufacturer. We are not all trusts. Do not legislate us to death.

Mr. BURTON. I have a telegram from the board of directors of the Builders' Exchange of Cleveland, Ohio, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 20, 1914.

Senator T. E. BURTON,
Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Builders' Exchange, representing 400 firms and individuals in the building industry in Cleveland, the secretary was instructed to express to you the earnest protest of the board against the adoption of the Clayton bill and the hope that you will use your best efforts to have action deferred, particularly under present disturbed business conditions of the country.

EDWARD A. ROBERTS, Secretary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the Woman's Missionary Auxiliary of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bellevue, Tex., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a petition of sundry citizens of Delphos, Kans., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the Grand Circle of Massachusetts, Companions of the Forest of America, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the Manufacturers' Association of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against an extension of the parcel-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. KENYON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to grant recognition to Dr. Cook in his polar efforts, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. OLIVER) presented a memorial of the Central Labor Union of Easton, Pa., remonstrating against the printing of corner cards on envelopes by contract, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also (for Mr. OLIVER) presented a petition of Local Union No. 2396, United Mine Workers of America, of Fayette City, Pa., and a petition of Sable Lodge, No. 72, Pennsylvania Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers of North America, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DILLINGHAM presented petitions of sundry citizens of Craftsbury, Essex, Concord, and Alburg, all in the State of Vermont, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SWANSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Beaver Dam, Clover, Runnymede, Elberon, Houston, Disputanta, Chatham Hill, Marion, Lowry, Sycamore, Henry, Rural Retreat, and Franklin, all in the State of Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for a system of personal rural credit, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6011) to reinstate Frederick J. Birkett as third lieutenant of the United States Revenue-Cutter Service, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 768) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5484) modifying and amending the act providing for the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, Mont., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 769) thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred Senate resolution 443, requesting the Secretary of Commerce to furnish the Senate with certain information relative to trade with South America, reported it without amendment.

Mr. KERN, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8428) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to publicity of contributions and expenditures made for the purpose of influencing the nomination and election of candidates for the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States, limiting the amount of campaign expenses, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 770) thereon.

STATUE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON GLICK.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably with an amendment Senate concurrent resolution No. 30, submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on July 23, authorizing the printing of 16,500 copies of the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Washington Glick, accompanied by an engraving of said statue, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, in line 8, after the words "distribution by the," to strike out "governor of Kansas; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed an engraving of said statue to accompany said proceedings, said engraving to be paid for out of the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing," and insert "Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Kansas. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable plate of said statue to accompany the proceedings," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Washington Glick 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 shall be for use and distribution by the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Kansas. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable plate of said statue to accompany the proceedings.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the last clause of the amendment to the resolution be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable plate of said statue to accompany the proceedings.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say to the Senator from West Virginia that in the past the Joint Committee on Printing have always been able to secure such plates from the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but it may be that we may be able to procure the plate in this case through the Public Printer.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes; that can be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

NOTE.—Figures of "Lead, manufactures of," for March, April, May, and June, 1914, include exportations of domestic pig lead, as follows: [1] $78,521; [2] $36,328; [3] $64,629; [4] $1,332,931; of which last-mentioned amount $1,211,931 represented the total exportations of domestic pig lead at the port of New York, viz: In March, $360,725; April, $391,223; May, $84,543; June, $375,471.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the report showing imports of these two metals demonstrates very conclusively that while the prices of both have declined during the period covered by them, this fact has been caused by other than tariff conditions.

The contention is made by protectionists, and correctly so, that where a reduction of duties results in a reduction of the market value of the article to which the duty relates, the fact will find expression in increased imports of that article. If the importations do not increase, the fall in such value must be attributed to other causes.

Mr. President, the imports of both these metals and of their manufactured products in the aggregate have fallen off very materially during the period ending on the 30th of June, 1914. Thus the imports of zinc ore and calamine for the previous year aggregated 51,934 tons, and for the second only 18,280 tons, being a decrease of 64.8 per cent.

The values of these ores for the two periods are, respectively, $831,080 and $251,479, showing a decrease of $579,601, or 69.8 per cent.

The imports of zinc in pig bars and old zinc during the first year amounted to 27,142,199 pounds, and in the last period to 2,145,089 pounds, showing a decrease of 24,997,110 pounds, or 92.1 per cent, with values, respectively, of $1,525,688 and $90,481, the decrease being $1,435,207, or 94 per cent.

There is a slight increase in the last over the first year of zinc-dust imports, amounting to 154,018 pounds, or three-tenths of 1 per cent, the figures being 4,653,646 pounds for 1913, and 4,807,664 pounds for 1914.

Of all other manufactures of zinc there were imported during the first period $121,238 in value, and during the last period $50,981, being a decrease of $70,259, or 58 per cent.

The total value of all zinc imports during the year ending June 30, 1913, was $2,742,370, and during the year ending June 30, 1914, was $615,651, a decrease in value of $2,126,419, or 77.6 per cent.

The figures concerning the importation of lead ores and manufactures are equally emphatic in their revelations upon this subject, although some specific increases appear. Thus for the year ending June 30, 1913, there were imported 48,889 long tons of lead ore, and for the next year 55,807 long tons, being an increase of 6,928 tons, or 14 per cent.

The discrepancy in values of these imports is notable and would indicate a decided rise in price. The lead value of the ores imported for the first period was $360,684, and for the last period $711,460, an increase of $350,596, or 97 per cent.

Of lead in other ores there was a very considerable decrease, but the returns are not satisfactory as to that item, for the reason that since the new tariff law went into operation the lead contents in ores carrying other metals is classified in the first item mentioned, if I am correctly informed. Of imports of lead bullion and base bullion for the year ending June 30, 1913, the amount was 123,070,513 pounds net, and for the next year only 37,059,518 pounds net, a decrease of 86,910,995 pounds, or 70 per cent. The total value of the imports for the first year was $2,940,061, and for the second $1,247,567, a decrease of $1,692,494, or 57.5 per cent.

Of pigs, bars, and old lead there were imported during the first period 337,703 pounds, and in the second period 236,691 pounds, being a decrease of 101,012 pounds, or 30 per cent, of the values, respectively, of $12,594 and $9,002, or a decrease of 28.5 per cent.

Of imports of all other manufactures of lead for the first year the values were $7,476, and for the second year $60,849, an increase of $53,373, or 814 per cent. The aggregate of the item being extremely small, however, the increase is not material as affecting the general result, which I now state:

The total value of all the imports of lead from June 30, 1912, to June 30, 1913, was $3,417,336, and for the year ending June 30, 1914, $2,057,470, or a decrease of $1,359,760, or 60.2 per cent.

It is evident beyond all controversy, therefore, Mr. President, that the market value of these two metals has been influenced entirely by the law of supply and demand and has not been in any wise affected by the reduction in the amount of the duties which prior to October, 1913, were imposed upon them.

It would, indeed, be amazing if these values were affected in the slightest degree by the Underwood-Simmons law in the face of a steady and considerable fall instead of a rise in the imports of the commodities in question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in this connection. I can not agree at all with the Senator from Colorado. The basic reason for the decline in the price and importation of lead into this country is that there has not been the demand in this country for lead, because all the industries of the country were affected directly and indirectly by the tariff. The reduction in rates affected not only those industries on which the rate of duty was reduced, but affected every industry in the United States. If Mexico had been in a normal condition and producing the amount of lead that she usually produces in times of peace, the price of lead in the United States under those conditions would have been lower than it has been.

It is true that the demand has affected the price of lead in the United States, but the reason for that is because the industries of the country, paralyzed as they have been through the operation of the last tariff law, have thrown a great many people out of employment and caused a less demand for the article, as shown by the figures the Senator himself has presented—a great reduction in importation and also a reduction in price because of the lack of a demand.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the decline in the market value of lead and zinc began long before the election of 1912. The conditions to which the Senator from Utah refers were not coincident with but preceded the change in revenue legislation by a long period of time. The market for these metals, of course, was responding to market conditions of a general character, they being dependent not so much upon any threatened or actual change in our revenue system as upon the general condition of business, not only in this country but throughout the world.

Our contention has been, Mr. President, that these depressions are and for several years have been world-wide in their influence and operation; that they are the result of general prevailing causes, which can not be confined to any one country and can not be predicated upon any one particular cause.

Of course I concede that there has not been a great deal of mining activity in Mexico during the troubles in that country, but the closing of Mexican lead and zinc mines should have stimulated both prices and production with us, if the Senator's logic is sound. It is remarkable that every prediction made of the operation and the effect of the reduction of tariff duties upon commodities in this country, which is not verified by the logic of events, is always explained or excused by the assertion that conditions are not normal or that some unforeseen circumstance has arisen to postpone or defeat them. The Mexican revolution was as active in 1913, when the new tariff bill was enacted and dismal prophecies of disaster were forecasted, as it has been since that time.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have an interesting interview with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], bearing date London, August 23, in reference to the attitude our Government should maintain in relation to the complications with foreign Governments. I ask permission that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LODGE WARNS OF DANGER IN BUYING SHIPS—INTERNATIONAL COMPLICATIONS ARE LIKELY, DECLARES SENIOR SENATOR FROM MASSACHUSETTS.

LONDON, August 23.

"No other such calamity as this war has ever befallen humanity or civilization," said Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts, in an interview in this city. "The mind recoils even from an attempt to picture the sacrifice of life and the misery and suffering which those who began this war have brought on mankind.

"My interest is in regard to my own country and her attitude in this great conflict of nations. Fortunately, the United States is outside the widespread circle of the war. The United States is at peace with all nations and I trust will remain so. From such a convulsion as this we have already suffered severely, financially and by the loss of some of our best markets, and commerce is bound to suffer still more. This can not be helped.

UNITED STATES MUST REMAIN NEUTRAL.

"What we should remember above all is that we have a national duty to perform. That duty is the observance of strict neutrality as between the belligerents, with all of whom we are at peace. But strict neutrality is not enough. It must be, also, honest neutrality, as honest as it is rigid. Neutrality, while preserving its name, can often be so managed as to benefit one belligerent and injure another. It is possible to relax the strictness of neutrality at one point and tighten it at another so as to help one belligerent and injure another.

"This is no time for neutrality of this kind on the part of the United States. Our neutrality now, as I have said, must not only be strict, but rigidly honest and fair. Honor and interest alike demand it.

CRITICIZES WILSON POLICY.

"President Wilson's administration, in its eagerness to maintain neutrality, has made one new departure from practices which have hitherto been unbroken. Heretofore Governments have not undertaken to interfere with private persons or institutions who desired to lend money to belligerents. If we had been unable to borrow money or obtain supplies from abroad while we were cut off from all supplies from the South during the Civil War, the boundaries of the country of which Mr. Wilson is President might possibly be far different to-day.

"But the administration, in its earnestness to maintain strict neutrality during the present war, has thought fit to make this new departure by preventing so far as it can private individuals from lending money to belligerents. This makes it difficult to understand what theory of neutrality they favor, if the dispatches are correct in regard to the proposed purchase by the United States Government of certain German ships now lying useless in New York Harbor. They regard as impairing strict neutrality the permission to private persons to lend $100,000,000 to France to be spent in the purchase of supplies in the United States, while at the same time they appear to think it is consonant with honest neutrality to give $25,000,000 of the purchase money outright to Germany for ships which Germany can not use.

WOULD HAMPER EXPORTS.

"This proposed purchase of German ships by the American Government to be run as Government vessels is calculated to hamper and check exports from the United States. We are suffering severely from the injury to our trade and commerce by the loss of our best markets, consequent on the war, but there are certain articles that Europe must have even now, and these exports should be encouraged in every possible way.

"Half a dozen ships owned by the Government can carry only an insignificant fraction of the exports we desire to make, but they will check all private enterprise and prevent Americans from purchasing ships, as they would otherwise do in large numbers, because they will fear the Government competition. We need every possible outlet at this moment, and Government ships will simply check some of the most important channels and give us 1 ship where we might have 10.

INTERNATIONAL COMPLICATIONS.

"Far more grave, however, than the interference with trade will be the international complications which these Government-owned ships are certain to produce. Are they to be regarded and treated as merchantmen, or are they public vessels of the United States on the same footing as our ships of war? It seems impossible that they should be treated as merchantmen under the rules of international law. If one of them should be stopped when classed as a merchantman, it would be at the worst only a diplomatic incident, for which reparation could easily be made; but if a ship of the United States in commerce and yet retaining the character of a public vessel should be stopped for any reason, that would be an act of war. If one of the German cruisers which are now said to be roaming over the Atlantic should hold up one of those Government-owned vessels because she believed this vessel was carrying contraband of war, the arrest would constitute an act of war against the United States.

DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT.

"If England or France believed that one of these Government-owned vessels was carrying supplies—say, oil—to Germany by way of Holland, and should stop that ship as they would a merchantman and turn her back, it would be an act of war. In neither of these supposed cases, if the vessel were a simple merchantman, would the act of Germany, England, or France be an act of war.

"In purchasing these vessels we should begin with a breach of strict neutrality by giving $25,000,000 to Germany. We should hamper and check the outward flow of our exports, which are of immense importance at this time. Worst of all, we should have half a dozen vessels afloat which might at any moment involve us in war with any or all of the belligerents. It is an experiment so dangerous that I earnestly hope that the report that the administration favors it is untrue, and that it will not be attempted.

"I repeat that our duty, honor, and interest alike demand at the present moment that we should maintain a neutrality toward all the belligerents which should be as honest as it is strict."

NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 42) of the House, which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,100 copies of the journal of the Forty-eighth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1914, not to exceed $1,600 in cost.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 16673. An act to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SALT LAKE AND OGDEN GATEWAYS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 446) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to inquire into the alleged closing of the Salt Lake and Ogden gateways on the Denver & Rio Grande Railway and other Gould lines.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire that the resolution shall go over without prejudice?

Mr. THOMAS. Without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over without prejudice.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 181) authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the contractor for building locks on Black Warrior River to proceed with the work without interruption to completion.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, before allowing unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution I should like to know certain facts. In the first place, this lock and the dam connected with it, as I understand, are the last in the system?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They are.

Mr. BURTON. And there is no further lock or dam advocated in the locality above this?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is not.

Mr. BURTON. An appropriation of $1,338,500 was made in 1913, which, it was supposed, would finish this work. I ask what is the reason that was not sufficient to finish it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That appropriation was made to complete the improvement of the Warrior River, which included the locks on the Tombigbee as well and Lock 17 on the Warrior River; but as the work proceeded the engineers discovered that there was likely to be a defect in the foundation unless the excavation was made deeper, and an additional appropriation was necessary in order to provide for that condition. The engineers required the contractor to go down several feet deeper in order to secure a proper foundation for that great structure.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I may say that this shows the lack of system and proper preparation in the making of our river and harbor appropriations. There ought to have been an estimate made based upon sufficient borings to ascertain just what the cost of this work would be. This present situation is incident to the system of making annual appropriations. If there had been a careful examination, and then, instead of making piecemeal appropriations, an appropriation and authorization of the amount required had been made, there would be no necessity for this joint resolution.

I consider this investment of some $10,000,000 in the canalization of these rivers as an experiment, very doubtful in its results; but at the same time it affords the best illustration to be found in the country of the desirability of improving rivers of minor size, because it brings the coal fields of northern Alabama into touch with the Gulf, where it has been necessary in the past to haul coal from a very considerable distance.

Before I give consent to the consideration of this joint resolution I want to say that there are a number of other instances in which there is equal emergency. I think the most urgent case of all is in the Hudson River. The Barge Canal is about to be completed at great expense by the State of New York, and there has been an implied understanding that the Government should finish its part of the work connecting the Barge Canal with Lake Erie and providing a channel through the Hudson River to New York contemporaneously with the completion of that canal by the State of New York. The traffic there, no doubt, will be infinitely greater than in the case of the Black Warrior River, and the improvement is of much greater importance. At the same time I am not sure that the contractor would be willing to make such an arrangement as this. A part of the work is done by the Government by hired labor.

Again, on the Ohio River there are several dams where it has been necessary to discharge the force because the work has been done by hired labor, and under the apportionment that is made there the amount does not seem to be sufficient to prosecute the work.

I am frank to say that I can not quite understand this—I call the attention of the Senate to one very peculiar fact: On the 30th of June last there was on hand to the credit of river and harbor improvements $45,000,000. The sundry civil appropriation bill passed in July appropriated approximately $7,000,000 more, making $52,000,000. The total amount expended for river and harbor improvements in the fiscal year ending June 3, 1912, was $33,000,000. In 1913 it was $38,000,000. So there was on hand at the expiration of the fiscal year of June 30, 1914, $14,000,000 more than the total amount expended in 1913, the last year for which we have the figures. The figures for 1914 will not be available until later.

It is true that this balance is not symmetrically divided. For instance, there is a balance of $700,000 on hand to the credit of the Ambrose Channel and New York Harbor, while the total amount that will probably be required for the present fiscal year would be but slightly in excess of $100,000. Thus we have this very singular situation: There is an agitation for the prompt passage of the river and harbor bill proceeding from all over the country, but nevertheless there is on hand in the Treasury subject to order for river and harbor improvements $14,000,000 more than was expended in the last year for which we have the figures. It seems to me this whole system should be overhauled.

Further, before consenting, I desire to have an assurance in regard to this measure. Everyone must recognize that it would be possible—and I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to this, as well as the attention of the Senator from Alabama—to tack on amendments to this joint resolution. If a case of equal urgency were discovered, I do not think there would be objection; but it would be possible to put on a multitude of items, and possibly, as an amendment, the whole river and harbor bill. As I understand, the Senator from Alabama would oppose any such proposition if the joint resolution should come back from the other House in such a form?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I certainly would, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina what his attitude would be in regard to such a contingency?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I catch the Senator's question. I came into the Chamber just a moment ago.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose this joint resolution were passed and sent over to the House, and they should load it down with a multitude of amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator to suggest that it might be possible to offer as an amendment to the joint resolution now under discussion the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BURTON. The whole river and harbor bill; that is a possibility.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no purpose of that sort, so far as I know.

Mr. BURTON. Would the Senator from North Carolina oppose such a proposition if the joint resolution came back from the House in such a form?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would undoubtedly do so.

Mr. BURTON. Then, Mr. President, I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints of monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to reconsider the votes by which sections 2 and 4 were stricken from the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, on Friday last the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made an important and interesting speech in favor of the motion to reconsider section 4 of the Clayton bill. He cited several cases from the Federal Reporter and one from the Supreme Court of the United States, Henry v. Dick Co. (224 U. S., 1), to support his proposition. His position was apparently this: That under this decision of the United States Supreme Court the owner of a patented article has the right to annex to its use such conditions as he wishes when he permits another to use it or to buy it; and the Senator was fearful that, taking advantage of that decision of the Supreme Court, the owner of a patented article might fix a condition that the article should not be used unless all other articles or machines used by the licensee or the purchaser should be leased or purchased of the owner of the patent, thus creating a monopoly that could not be prevented by the antitrust laws. This proposition might hit with special force the manufacturers of shoe machinery who are trying to compete with the United Shoe Machinery Co.

I have no doubt this matter was drawn to the attention of the Senator from Missouri by letters from manufacturers of shoes in his State and possibly from manufacturers of shoe machinery in his State, as I have had the same thing brought to my attention by manufacturers in my State.

I will read two letters from a manufacturer in my State, who states a very troublesome and very important situation. He says:

FARMINGTON SHOE MANUFACTURING CO.,
Dover, N. H., July 24, 1914.

Hon. HENRY F. HOLLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We see by the papers that the Clayton bill has been reported upon by the Committee on the Judiciary and that it will be taken up by the Senate in the course of the next few days.

In reading section 4 it would appear to cover exactly the point in the shoe-machinery situation we believe should be covered, if any antitrust legislation is passed. We refer to the monopolistic leases of the United Shoe Machinery Co., which will practically prohibit the shoe manufacturer from using any of the essential machines except those of the United Shoe Machinery Co.; in other words, all their essential machinery is tied together, directly or indirectly.

We are interested in this matter by reason of our having recently installed in our factory machines made by an independent concern, viz, the Universal Shoe Machinery Co., of St. Louis, Mo.

We were operating formerly a factory on one style shoe, manufactured solely on the bottoming machines of the United Shoe Machinery Co. Our business was steadily declining, wholly by reason of this particular process, the McKay shoe being displaced by Goodyear welts. We therefore were forced to make other plans. By the addition of these machines from the Universal Shoe Machinery Co. we were able to make a new style shoe that immediately became very popular, and our outlook never was better for a successful factory proposition.

The United Shoe Machinery Co. were well informed about our efforts several months ago, but within the past few weeks they have first deemed it necessary to notify us of their position, and their position practically prohibits us making this shoe.

The machines we are using are only auxiliary to their machines, and we have not decreased but increased the royalties or profits paid to them since the installation of these machines; but, notwithstanding this, they insist that we must cease using the independent machines or return part of their machines, which means that we must abandon this process, as we can not get a full line of essential machines anywhere in this country except from the United Shoe Machinery Co. In other words, we must do business with them or not at all.

We quote from their letter, dated July 17, and signed by their secretary, as follows:

"We feel, however, that we should be obliged to exercise the option reserved to us under the metallic department leases which you hold to terminate such leases and take back our metallic department machines, for we neither desire our machines to stand idle in your factory nor can we afford to permit them to be retained under the manufacturing conditions which you have indicated to us."

If this is not an attempt at a direct restraint of trade, we are not well informed on the subject. The position of the United Shoe Machinery Co., in a few words, is that, no matter how much our success depends upon our being allowed to use independent machines, nor how much saving we could make, we are not allowed to use this machinery without their consent or without breaking their leases; and what is true of us is also true of practically every other shoe manufacturer of this country, and we think that such a condition should appeal very directly to you as a representative of a party pledged to give freedom to business in this country.

Very truly, yours,

E. O. TEAGUE,
General Manager.

FARMINGTON SHOE MANUFACTURING CO.,
Dover, N. H., July 30, 1914.

Hon. HENRY F. HOLLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of July 28, you most certainly have our permission to use our letter of July 24 during the debate on the Clayton bill. Furthermore, we should be pleased to furnish you with a photographic copy of the original letter, if necessary, so that there may be no question as to its authenticity.

The United Shoe Machinery Co. in a more recent letter have notified us that we have 30 days to decide on what action we will take. It may seem very easy, according to the United Shoe Machinery's statements, for a manufacturer to use an independent machine by complying with their rules. As a simple illustration we might state our position, as follows: By reason of using one machine from an outside machinery company which will cost perhaps $300 the United Shoe Machinery Co. propose to enforce a condition that would oblige us to pay approximately $25,000 for machines we have had from them and used for years in addition to the regular royalty, such as we have previously paid, without any initial payment. In other words, it makes the cost of the independent machine over $25,000. Naturally most any manufacturer would hesitate to put in an independent machine under these conditions.

There is another condition in connection with their business that should be prevented by legislation; that is, retaining patents in the Patent Office for years for no other purpose apparently than to prevent patents being issued to other inventors on the same subject.

We wish to work with you in every way possible to further this proposed legislation, as it certainly means a great hardship to us as comparatively small manufacturers if the present conditions are allowed to stand.

We wish to add also that we were entirely ignorant regarding violation of our leases when we first commenced making this shoe, and we used our first machine nearly two years before being notified of the conditions.

We wish to call particular attention to that part of our letter of July 24 in which we quote from their letter of July 17. While on their machines in other departments they have made us a price that figures, as we have stated, to about $25,000, in the metallic department they give us no option whatever. The only thing we can do is to comply with their terms, which they quote in their letter of July 17.

Any further information we should be very glad to give you or, if necessary, we should be very glad to send a representative to Washington with full particulars.

Thanking you for your interest in the matter, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

FARMINGTON SHOE MFG. CO.,
E. O. TEAGUE, General Manager.

I would be the last to oppose the reconsideration of the vote whereby section 4 was stricken out if I believed that it would have the result which the Senator from Missouri fears. The shoe-manufacturing industry is most important in both Missouri and New Hampshire. The latest available figures are for 1904. In that year Massachusetts lead in the manufacture of boots and shoes and slippers, the number produced being 118,009,926 pairs; New York was next with 28,538,451 pairs; and then came Missouri and New Hampshire with twenty-five million and odd pairs each. The total production in the United States is 285,017,181 pairs. So the Senator from Missouri may well be fearful that if section 4 is left out of this bill, and that omission has the result which he prophesies, much injury may be done. I do not, however, share his fears.

A week or two ago the Senator from Missouri rather sarcastically suggested that I would better consult my legal adviser on this matter. Of course that was intended to state that a better lawyer than I should be consulted. I am always glad to take that advice; a lawyer who has practiced 20 years would be foolish not to get the advice of a strong lawyer, if he was available, but in this particular case I am reminded by one of the cases cited by my friend from Missouri that I was myself engaged in that same litigation and that I have been engaged as counsel in a few restraint-of-trade cases.

In establishing his proposition he refers to the case of Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. against O'Brien, reported in Ninety-third Federal Reporter, page 200. I quote from the remarks of the Senator from Missouri in regard to that case:

> That was a patented riveting machine, and it was tied to unpatented rivets. That is to say, the man who bought the riveting machine was compelled to buy the unpatented rivets from the man who sold the patented machine. Thus he obtained a monopoly, or at least a partial monopoly, not only upon his machine, but was able to restrain trade in rivets.

I feel that a man who owns a piece of property of any kind, patented or unpatented, can sell it or lease it and annex such conditions to its use as he pleases. If a man breeds and sells racing horses, he may annex to the sale of one of those horses a condition that it shall not be raced until it is 3 years old, and that is right for the protection of his trade name. So in the mimeograph case, the owner of that patented machine, I feel, would have a right to say that only materials of a certain kind should be used in the machine, for the reason that if an inferior ink or a poor quality of paper were used the results obtained from the machine might be very bad, and thereby hurt the reputation of that particular machine. So in the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. case, if an inferior kind of rivet were used, the material might be too hard and actually injure the machine and make it unworkable, or the rivets might come out, and that would hurt the sale of the machine.

In one of the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. cases I was counsel. That case is found in One hundred and fifty-ninth Federal Reporter, page 824. That case was brought in the United States court and was argued in the United States circuit court of appeals at Boston, the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] being one of the three judges who heard the argument.

I argued the case for the Exeter Boot & Shoe Co. My opponent was Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, of Boston, who is probably as able a trust lawyer as there is in the country; and I felt that I was fortunate to obtain the decision both from the jury and from the court of appeals.

In that case my client, the Exeter Boot & Shoe Co., had been getting its riveting machines for years from the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. There arose a quarrel over a 25-cent item for freight; and the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. finally wrote to my client that if he did not pay that 25 cents they would not furnish him any more goods. He went to the telephone and telephoned to Whitcher & Co., of Boston, and asked if they could furnish him—these were hooks attached to shoes—as good hooks as the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. They said they could furnish better ones, and they would send along a large amount of hooks, with two machines for affixing them.

Now, my client made no complaint at all that he could not use hooks that he bought of other manufacturers in the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. machines. He realized that they had a right to prescribe the conditions under which their patented machines should be used. But the result was this: The machines were not delivered by Whitcher & Co.; and my client found later that Whitcher & Co. and the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. and a third company were in a pool under which they controlled the whole trade in New England, and my client was obliged to shut down his factory because he could not get the hooks and the machines until he had settled this 25-cent freight bill.

I brought suit first against Whitcher & Co. for breach of contract, and then against the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. for interfering with his trade relations, and under the common law I was able to recover from both and collect; and it was no defense to the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. for interfering in the trade relations of my client that it had a patented article and could annex to it any conditions that it chose.

If I believed that the conditions a patentee is allowed to annex to the use of his patented article would be permitted to go to the length of establishing a monopoly or a combination in restraint of trade, I should be in favor of restoring section 4. But there are two kinds of monopoly, side by side. The patent monopoly is given to the owner of the patent so that he may handle that particular article under the patent as he chooses; but the other kind of monopoly does not spring from the patent, but springs from a condition that arises when the owner of the patent, by combination, is able to monopolize any particular branch of trade.

The Bathtub Trust cases, which are cited under the name of the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. against United States, in Two hundred and twenty-sixth United States, at page 20, are a complete answer to the proposition that the owner of a patent may rely upon his patent to establish restraint of trade and a monopoly in a particular branch of the trade; and the case of Henry against Dick, in Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States, page 1, which was the basis of the Senator's argument last Friday, is very carefully distinguished in that case. I will read the first three headnotes in the Bathtub case:

A trade agreement under which manufacturers, who prior thereto were independent and competitive, combined and subjected themselves to certain rules and regulations, among others limiting output and sales of their product and quantity, vendees, and price, held in this case to be illegal under the Sherman Antitrust Act of July 2, 1890. (Montague v. Lowry, 193 U. S., 38.)

A trade agreement involving the right of all parties thereto to use a certain patent, which transcends what is necessary to protect the use of the patent or the monopoly thereof as conferred by law and controls the output and price of goods manufactured by all those using the patent, is illegal under the antitrust act of 1890. (Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S., 70, and Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U. S., 1, distinguished.)

While rights conferred by patents are definite and extensive, they do not give a universal license against positive prohibitions any more than any other rights do.

The attorney for the trust in this case was very quick to seize the Dick case and to found upon it an argument similar to the argument of the Senator from Missouri. He refers to it in his brief as follows, at page 23:

The provisions in the license agreements as to prices were intended to enable the licensees to make a reasonable profit, so that they would be able to maintain and improve the quality of the ware and pay the royalties reserved. The owner of a patent can protect his invention by making agreements controlling the product of the use of his invention and which admit that by the use of that invention the product is better than if made by any other known method of manufacturing the product.

And he cites as authority Henry against A. B. Dick Co., supra. In his argument, on page 25, he cites the same case and says:

They were, moreover, based upon patents which created a true monopoly, a grant from the sovereign—the Constitution—so that to hold that this monopoly was violative of the Sherman Act would be judicial legislation and an attack upon the whole patent system.

The opinion of the court very clearly distinguishes cases where an actual monopoly exists, such as the United Shoe Machinery Co. has, and cases where conditions are annexed to the use of a patented article. I quote from page 47 of the opinion:

In this statement certain things are prominent. Before the agreement the manufacturers of enameled ware were independent and competitive. By the agreements they were combined, subjected themselves to certain rules and regulations, among others not to sell their product to the jobbers except at a price fixed not by trade and competitive conditions but by the decision of the committee of six of their number, and zones of sales were created. And the jobbers were brought into the combination and made its subjection complete and its purpose successful. Unless they entered the combination they could obtain no enameled ware from any manufacturer who was in the combination, and the condition of entry was not to resell to plumbers except at the prices determined by the manufacturers. The trade was, therefore, practically controlled from producer to consumer, and the potency of the scheme was established by the cooperation of 85 per cent of the manufacturers, and their fidelity to it was secured not only by trade advantages but by what was practically a pecuniary penalty, not inaptly termed in the argument "cash bail." The royalty for each furnace was $5, 80 per cent of which was to be returned if the agreement was faithfully observed; it was to be "forfeited as a penalty" if the agreement was violated. And for faithful observance of their engagements the jobbers, too, were entitled to rebates from their purchases. It is testified that 90 per cent of the jobbers in number and more than 90 per cent in purchasing power joined the combination.

Then the court says (p. 48):

The agreements clearly, therefore, transcended what was necessary to protect the use of the patent or the monopoly which the law conferred upon it. They passed to the purpose and accomplished a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman law. It had, therefore, a purpose and accomplished a result not shown in the Bement case. There was a contention in that case that the contract of the National Harrow Co. with Bement & Sons was part of a contract and combination with many other companies and constituted a violation of the Sherman law; but the fact was not established, and the case was treated as one between the particular parties, the one granting and the other receiving a right to use a patented article, with conditions suitable to protect such use and secure its benefits. And there is nothing in Henry v. A. B. Dick Co. (224 U. S., 1) which contravenes the views herein expressed.

The agreements in the case at bar combined the manufacturers and jobbers of enameled ware very much to the same purpose and results as the association of manufacturers and dealers in tiles combined them in Montague & Co. v. Lowry (193 U. S., 38), which combination was condemned by this court as offending the Sherman law. The added element of the patent in the case at bar can not confer immunity from a like condemnation for the reasons we have stated. And this we say without entering into the consideration of the distinction of rights for which the Government contends between a patented article and a patented tool used in the manufacture of an unpatented article. Rights conferred by patents are indeed very definite and extensive, but they do not give any more than other rights a universal license against positive prohibitions. The Sherman law is a limitation of rights, rights which may be pushed to evil consequences, and therefore restrained.

There are two other Federal cases which state this same view. The first is the case of United States against New Departure Manufacturing Co., Two hundred and fourth Federal Reporter, page 107. That is the case involving the coaster brake. I shall not read from the syllabus, but I shall read a paragraph from the opinion at page 113:

In the Bathtub Trust case (226 U. S., 20; 33 Sup. Ct., 9; 57 L. Ed., —), so called, a case recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, a situation somewhat similar to this in respect to quantity of output and license agreement was presented, and the court said:

"The trade was, therefore, practically controlled from producer to consumer, and the potency of the scheme was established by the cooperation of 85 per cent of the manufacturers. * * * The agreements therefore clearly transcended what was necessary to protect the use of the patent or the monopoly which the law conferred upon it. They passed to the purpose and accomplished a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman law."

The Supreme Court then pointed out the distinction between that case and the case of Bement v. National Harrow Co. (186 U. S., 70; 22 Sup. Ct., 747; 46 L. Ed., 1058); but, nevertheless, the intimation in the opinion is clear that the monopoly secured to the patentee by the issuance of a patent can not be designedly used to form a combination or conspiracy between manufacturers and dealers to accomplish a restraint of trade such as the antitrust act prohibits. Upon this subject the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, in National Harrow Co. v. Hench et al. (83 Fed., 36; 27 C. C. A., 349; 39 L. R. A., 299), has aptly said:

"The fact that the property involved is covered by letters patent is issued as a justification; but we do not see how any importance can be attributed to this fact. Patents confer a monopoly as respects the property covered by them, but they confer no right upon the owners of several distinct patents to combine for the purpose of restraining competition and trade. Patented property does not differ in this respect from any other. The fact that only the patentee may possess himself of several patents, and thus increase his monopoly, affords no support for an argument in favor of a combination by several distinct owners of such property to restrain manufacture, control sales, and enhance prices. Such combinations are conspiracies against the public interests and abuses of patent privileges."

The language quoted was cited with approval by Judge Coxe in National Harrow Co. v. Hench et al. (C. C., 84 Fed., 226).

In Blount Manufacturing Co. v. Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co. (C. C., 166 Fed., 557), of the patentees' privilege of combining their patent rights, the court said:

"Where, however, each patentee continues to make his own goods under his own patents, and seeks to enhance his profits by agreement with creditors who make either patented or unpatented articles, then it seems to follow that the agreement of each to restrain his own trade can not be regarded merely as an incident to the assignment of patent rights. The patentee then restrains his own trade, not for the purpose of enhancing the value of the license which he grants, but for the purpose of enhancing the value of his trade by removing competition.

"So here, as claimed by the Government, the license agreements were resorted to as a subterfuge to aid in stifling competition in trade and commerce and to enhance the value of the respective businesses of the defendant and to create a monopoly in their productions. In Sanitary Manufacturing Co. against United States (the Bathtub Trust case) the Supreme Court clearly supports the view that patentees' rights are limited by the antitrust act, as the following excerpt from the opinion shows:

"Rights conferred by patents are, indeed, very definite and extensive, but they do not give any more than other rights a universal license against positive prohibitions. The Sherman law is a limitation of rights—rights which may be pushed to evil consequences, and therefore restrained."

Before I cite the last case I want to recall the attention of the Senate to the exact situation here. After weeks of argument we have passed a trade commission bill with very much more teeth in it than anyone supposed it would have when it started, and the power in the bill was added here in the Senate. It confers on the trade commission authority to determine the facts as to unfair competition, and whenever competition is unfair to set effective machinery in motion to prevent it. Now, those of us who believe that the phrase "unfair competition" means something and is inclusive, do not like to see the broad scope of that phrase weakened by an attempted definition in some other bill. Therefore it does not seem a symmetrical or proper way to treat the subject to single out one or two forms of unfair competition, thereby seeming to lay special stress upon them.

The third case that I am going to cite is a case that deals with a subject precisely such as was suggested by the Senator from Missouri, where the court says in so many terms that that is unfair competition, and therefore it is very clear that the court will treat it as unfair competition under the trade commission bill. I refer to one of the Cash Register cases, United States against Patterson, Two hundred and fifth Federal Reporter, page 292, and I will read the first headnote:

Both the patent laws and the Sherman Antitrust Act (act July 2, 1890, ch. 647, 26 Stat., 209, U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200) were enacted under constitutional authority, and they must be construed together, giving full force and effect to each, so far as that may be done. That a patentee, by putting his invention to use, has become entitled to a monopoly in its manufacture and sale, and that his competitors in interstate commerce therein are infringers of his patent, does not give him a right to resort to methods of unfair competition to force the competitors out of business; and such action, pursuant to a conspiracy or combination, is in restraint of interstate commerce, and in violation of the antitrust act.

This is a case that arose in the southern district of Ohio. On page 294 I quote the following:

This language of Judge Baker was cited by counsel for defendants in support of his argument that the restraint of trade contemplated by the act could only be with reference to a trade which in itself might rightfully be carried on; that there could be no restraint of a trade of which the patentee has a monopoly by law; that there can be no conspiracy in restraint of such trade or illegal monopoly of it, when the one charged has a legal monopoly under the patent law. So far is the argument carried that counsel frankly claim in it that, no matter how illegal the acts charged were in themselves, not conceding their illegality at all, infringers had no right to engage in their infringing trade, and the patentee had the legal right to protect his monopoly, even with the strong arm. Counsel for the Government, not admitting infringement on the part of any of the competitors of the National Cash Register Co., and assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that they were infringers, argue that the question is not material to any issue in this case.

Defendants urge: That a patent is a property right; so it is. That it may be assigned; so it may be under the patent laws. That it descends to the heirs at law; the Supreme Court has so held. But counsel have cited no case—if there had been one, they would have found it—and the assertion, usually of doubtful wisdom, may in this connection be safely made that no decision will be found sanctioning acts of violence by a patentee in the protection of his patent right, acts of violence against the claimed infringing article, or the business of the infringers. And it may also be safely said that, at least until the patentee has established the validity of his patent and the fact of infringement, he will not be permitted by a court of equity, and at the suit of even one who may eventually be held to be an infringer, to engage in acts of unfair competition.

Citing authorities.

So here, again and again, we come across the phrase "unfair competition" as applied not only to acts in restraint of trade, but to acts in restraint of trade in connection with patents issued by the Government of the United States.

Proceeding with the opinion, on page 295:

The claim is made that the patentee, having a property right may protect his property by destroying the property of an infringer, on the same principle that he may cut off the limbs of his neighbor's trees projecting into his yard or cut off his neighbor's eaves projecting over his land, or may in some cases abate nuisances, etc.; but this claim involves a misconception of the nature of property in a patent, as will be shown. It is said that a patentee may destroy infringers' business by acts of unfair competition in self-defense, but even in criminal law the old rule was that one could defend on the ground of self-defense when he was driven to the wall, and only then.

And then, on pages 297 and 298, the Bathtub Trust and Creamery Package cases are cited, and the distinction I have already drawn is emphasized. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], with his usual force and clearness, pointed out this distinction on Friday. He did not have the cases at hand at the time, cases that fully uphold his position, but the Senator from Montana disagrees with me in believing that the owner of a patented article should not be allowed to annex to its use any condition he chooses so long as it does not monopolize the particular branch of trade. I can not see that the patent has anything to do with the condition. No matter what I make, I may annex such conditions as I please to its use, and I think that ought to be permitted.

The great importance of the Dick case, cited by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], was not in the proposition, so well understood, that a patentee may annex such conditions as he chooses to the use of the patented article, but what the court emphasized in that case was this: That was a case not for a breach of contract, but a case for infringement of a patent, and the court held that where the contract annexed to the use of a patented article was violated it constituted what is known as a contributory infringement, and therefore the United States court had jurisdiction of the suit, no matter whether there was diversity of citizenship or not. That was a very important decision, because it drew to the Federal courts of the United States all contracts involving patented articles, and where the adversary parties were in the same State the one who claimed the infringement could go into the United States court because it was a patent matter and have his right decided in the United States court.

While I do not agree with the Senator from Montana that it is a wrongful thing or a harmful thing to allow conditions to be annexed to the use of a patented article, and I am not sure he would go quite as far as that, I do feel there is a situation existing in the United Shoe Machinery cases which is so acute and so important that if these men are asking for relief that will be speedy and effective I shall not oppose it, and I feel that the amendment which the Senator from Montana says he will introduce which will go right at the root of this difficulty and make a special offense of that behavior and bring it sharply and quickly to the attention of the Federal trade commission without any doubt of its authority to deal with that class of cases, should be supported.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that he is in favor of passing an amendment similar to that which has been offered by the Senator from Montana, which will deal directly with the class of practices indulged in by the Shoe Machinery Trust and to bring it sharply to the attention of the trade commission. Are we to understand that he is not willing to have that right so guarded that those who are injured can go into court and protect themselves, or does he mean that they must all be relegated to the trade commission?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to have this opportunity to explain that point. The trade commission bill and the present bill leave every person who is damaged by unfair competition free to go to any court having jurisdiction and sue for damages and get an injunction, and that is right. They should be allowed to go, just as I went to the Federal court for relief in the Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. case, and just as numerous others have gone to the court for protection. The courts are open to them, and if a right is violated the violation of the right gives to a man his right to his remedy in the courts. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. Not to interrupt the Senator, not to engage in any debate, but simply to get his view, do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to hold that, having passed a bill creating a trade commission and prohibiting unfair competition, in his view any person feeling that he has been treated unfairly can go into the courts for primary relief?

Mr. HOLLIS. I have not the slightest doubt about it. Anyone who is injured by unfair competition may sue the person who has so injured him. There is nothing in any statute which forbids it; there is nothing in any case which forbids it. Unfair competition is declared to be unlawful. There is an analogy all through the field of law. There is a law in most States which provides that when you are driving a team you must turn out to the right. If you turn out to the left, and then some one is injured, that statute is introduced in evidence to establish your negligence. It is not in all cases negligence per se, but in some States it is held to be evidence of negligence. If anyone should injure me by unfair competition against my business, I could bring a suit for damages for that injury, and the first thing I would introduce would be the statute making unfair competition illegal. That would be in some jurisdictions conclusive evidence of negligence and in others it would be merely evidence to be considered by the jury with other evidence.

Mr. REED. I think I understand the Senator now. I only want to be sure that I do understand him, because I state to him very frankly I shall reply to his statements to-morrow morning. I would reply now, but part of them I did not hear. I understand the Senator's position now to be that if section 5 of the trade commission bill is enacted into a law, without any other legislation, any person who feels that he has been the victim of unfair competition can at once go into any Federal court and bring his suit and maintain it there, without having first gone to the trade commission.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is not exactly accurate, although that may be correct. I do not say a Federal court. I am quite sure it would not give the Federal court jurisdiction in all cases, but he might go into a court having jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. Either State or Federal?

Mr. HOLLIS. Either State or Federal. I hope the Senator will address himself to that, because if I am mistaken in that proposition I shall be very glad, indeed, to know it. I think it is of very great importance.

Mr. REED. Now——

Mr. HOLLIS. Let me finish my answer to the Senator's first question before we get too far away. I am in favor of amending this bill so as to include the class of cases the Senator from Montana brought up—the Mimeograph case, which was discussed, I think, by the Senator from Missouri. It does not seem harmful or injurious to annex to the sale or the lease of any article, patented or unpatented, that it shall be used only with the ink, paper, or supplies furnished by the owner of the patent or the seller or lessor of the article. In my judgment there is, however, serious doubt whether that would be considered unfair competition in most cases. If it were carried far enough to give to the owner of the mimeograph the entire control of the mimeograph business, that would constitute unfair competition and be subject to the inhibition of the trade-commission law. But I am willing, for the sake of making a concession, to have the case of the sole right to sell supplies included under the amendment the Senator from Montana proposes to offer. That is the answer to the Senator's first question.

Mr. REED. So that is the Senator's position. I will not ask questions at all that are unpleasant.

Mr. HOLLIS. They can not be too unpleasant. I am used to it.

Mr. REED. I am not asking an unnecessary question.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator may ask any questions he may think of, and if I can answer them I will.

Mr. REED. I am only trying to elicit the Senator's opinion. As I understand the Senator now, he is willing to have an amendment adopted which will prohibit the practices of the Shoe Machinery Trust—I will call it for the want of a better name—and he is willing to go further than that and have a substantive law passed prohibiting the contract by which the owner of a patented article compels the owner or lessees of that article to use certain supplies.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; the Senator misunderstands me. The whole proposition is included in the case the Senator last stated, because that would incidentally cover the Shoe Machinery case. In my judgment, the Shoe Machinery case is fully covered by the Sherman antitrust law, and the decree in that case will be in favor of the Government. But the concession I am willing to make is the one last stated by the Senator, to the effect that exclusive-use contracts of patented articles shall be void, as provided by the Senator from Montana, so as to cover cases like the Shoe Machinery case, and the Mimeograph case, and the Harrow case, I think it is; and there are others.

Mr. REED. As a general proposition?

Mr. HOLLIS. As a general proposition.

Mr. REED. The Senator means if I sell a patented article to him, or if I lease it to him, I can not attach a condition compelling him to purchase his supplies from me?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; I am willing to go to that extent.

Mr. REED. If the Senator goes to that extent, if he will permit me, I will say that he and I are on a common ground.

Mr. HOLLIS. The trouble was pointed out carefully by the Senator from Montana on Friday, and the motion to reconsider would include both sections 2 and 4.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, he is wrong about the motion to reconsider. The notice to reconsider was a general notice that the motion would be made, and it was entered.

Mr. HOLLIS. Does the Senator understand that two and four can be divided so that only four may be considered?

Mr. REED. You can always divide.

Mr. HOLLIS. If that is done, and the Senator can show that section 4 is not broader than the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana—and I understand it is very much broader and will cover many cases that it ought not to cover—then I shall vote for it. I am willing to go to that extent, but not further.

Mr. REED. The amendment of the Senator from Montana covers only such cases as the Shoe Machinery case, but does not go to the question of supplies if I correctly understand the matter. What I was anxious to know was if the Senator was willing—and he has already answered me on that very fully that he is willing—to cover supplies. I take it the Senator is not wedded to any particular amendment, but is willing to go to the extent of prohibiting contracts such as the Shoe Machinery Co. make, whether covered in the motion of the Senator from Montana or in section 4. That principle the Senator is ready to support.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have already told the learned Senator once——

Mr. REED. I do not ask it again.

Mr. HOLLIS. That I do not think the Shoe Machinery case should be covered by the amendment. I think it is covered by the Sherman antitrust law. So far as cases like the Mimeograph case, which are cases covering supplies, I do think they should be covered and might be properly covered by it. That is just what I answered 10 minutes ago.

Mr. REED. I am not trying to cavil over this matter, but I want the Senator to understand that I am trying to be as polite as I know how to be. I am simply trying to get his views. If there is a doubt about the Shoe Machinery case, would not the Senator be willing to put in a positive law prohibiting the practice and end that doubt?

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Montana does do just that. I do not think it is necessary, but I think in order to end that doubt it should be done. I think that does the business, and I shall favor it when it is offered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to interrupt the Senators merely to make a suggestion that I think might be pertinent for consideration at this time, when we are on the eve of possibly yielding an agreement to sustain an idea advanced? I heard the Senator from Montana present his proposition, which I recognized, I thought, as the embodiment of the bill presented by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I have just heard the able Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] make concession to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on this question. In my humble judgment, the proposed amendment, if passed, would absolutely have no potent effect, for the reason that when a man attempted to buy a machine and there was written in his contract that in consideration of the price of the machine and in consideration of purchasing a certain quantity or a certain class of supplies, and he made such contract, it could not be made illegal by action of ours, because it is his liberty to make his contract, and under the case of Allgeyer against Louisiana, which I think you will find in One hundred and sixty-fifth United States, I advise the learned Senators who have given this question much more attention than I that there was then the very question now at issue. There it was held that an attempt to prevent by law a contract being made between persons not illegal in itself was an infringement of that constitutional clause guaranteeing the right of liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That the word "liberty" must be construed to mean the right to make any kind of a contract that in itself is not contra bonos mores. That is the view which I would like to ask the learned Senator to take into consideration.

Mr. REED. The case the Senator refers to I have not read for some time, but I remember it, and I think the line of distinction is very clear.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not remember it quite absolutely.

Mr. REED. If the Senator's position as stated by him is correct, and if the broad principle of the Constitution exists which provides that a man in contracting with reference to his property can do anything with it which is not contrary to public morals, then we might just as well wipe out all our antitrust work, because every antitrust statute is based upon the idea that no man can use his property so as to destroy the right of another man to use his property. While it is true as a constitutional proposition that A owning a piece of property has the free right to use it, the legislative authority does not impinge upon that constitutional liberty when it says to the man owning the property: "You shall not use it in such a way as to destroy the liberties of others."

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether in his opinion the antitrust statute itself is not a restriction upon the unlimited power of Congress.

Mr. REED. I think it is.

Mr. WALSH. I ask him whether if section 5 of the trade commission bill has any efficacy at all it is not likewise a restriction upon the power of Congress.

Mr. REED. Possibly a restriction if it has any efficacy.

Mr. LEWIS. I hold the distinction to be this, if I may be pardoned for injecting into a debate I am not regularly in: The antitrust acts are based upon the violation of matters which are in themselves restraints of trade and in themselves injurious to the public, though it may concern individuals or parties as far as the matter is in hand. The unfair competition clause is likewise addressed to the unfair competition between the parties, not the result of dealings between them, but of dealings adverse and against them. That, I fear, is the distinction that is going to give us all the trouble eventually.

I had hoped, Mr. President, at some time—possibly during this debate—to offer my humble views to the Senator, who has given this subject great consideration, to show wherein I feel there is great danger, in view of the conflict between these two measures. I now suggest it. Unfair competition by that general phrase I have defended, and I have continued to defend, because I see its absolute validity from the standpoint of a lawyer. I realize that if the definition could be so exact as to embrace all conditions that could arise, it would be much more desirable; but the reason I defend it is that it relates to conduct on the part of individuals against others, without their consent and against their interest, and therefore will so be construed wherever it can be brought before the court as involving any set of circumstances which worked such results. But I fear, in the matter referred to by the able Senators from New Hampshire, Missouri, and Montana, who have just spoken, that where we attempt in this body to pass a law which specifically says that A shall not contract with B that the latter shall receive from the former supplies, we invalidate a contract between A and B in the face of the specific provision of the Constitution that allows to each individual liberty of transactions between himself and another individual, and we could not pass such an act as that without doing two things—invading the domain of personal liberty to contract and violating the domain of personal rights of contract.

For that reason it seems to me that such an act is likely to be obnoxious to the constitutional provision, and, as it seems to me, within the rule of Allgeyer against Louisiana, because the distinction made there is this: That only that conduct of A against the world and against the community may be interdicted by law, unless the act is contrary to good morals and to justice, while an arrangement which is made between A and B as to sales between themselves, a contract between themselves, is a different matter, and a law designed to prevent such contracts as that infringes the personal liberty of individuals. That is the fear I have, and that is the distinction that I find, but I yield to those who have more studiously thought on this subject. I am merely expressing the fear I have of the unconstitutionality of such legislation.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon merely a suggestion?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I think I can show the Senator by a very old illustration that his fears are based upon the fact that he has, I think, overlooked some matters. The Senator seems to take the view that the test is that the Government, the lawmaking body, can not interfere in a contract between two people; that they are at liberty to contract as they please.

Mr. LEWIS. When it does not touch the public morals.

Mr. REED. When it does not touch the public morals.

Now, A, we will say, is engaged in running a store; he sells out to B, and he signs a contract that he will never again engage in the grocery business. That is a contract between those parties, and yet such a contract has always been declared to be a void contract.

Mr. LEWIS. Not if A adds the qualification of a geographical limitation to it.

Mr. REED. Ah, but that does not help it. If A has a liberty of contract, he has the right to make a contract for his whole life and for the whole domain.

Mr. LEWIS. May I show the able Senator a distinction there?

Mr. REED. The courts made the distinction that as long as they limited the length of time the contract was to run, and put in a reasonable limit, and a limited place, that they would not strike down the right to make that sort of a contract; but if they did not put those limitations in, making the contract reasonable both as to time and place, they would strike down the contract, not upon the ground that a crime had been committed, not that there had been any bad morals involved, but upon the ground that such contracts were against the public policy of the land; that they deprive the rest of the community of that kind of service which might otherwise be rendered to the community by the individual who had tied himself up in an unlimited contract.

It is upon the very doctrine that is involved in that old simple line of cases that the whole doctrine of the restraint of trade, if I understand correctly, has finally been built. When I go out into the community and contract with B and C and D and E and all others who engage in manufacturing certain products that they will unite with me, and thus control the whole business of the country, it is because that is a restraint not only of individuals but a restraint of the opportunity of the public to purchase that we have the doctrine of the restraint of trade invoked.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me state——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will allow me to say this final word—and I am not saying this for the sake of controversy——

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, no; we are discussing, like lawyers, an abstract legal question.

Mr. REED. I think there can be no doubt about the proposition that of course the Government can not arbitrarily deny a man the right to use his property and the right to enjoy it; that is fundamental—the right to enjoy its issues and profits is his. That right is exhausted when it reaches the point where it can be said, and the statement be consistent with reason, that in exercising his property right he has invaded the rights of the general public. There is the point, I think, where legislative authority attaches.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri that here is the basis of my distinction: A contract made between JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, of Illinois, and JAMES A. REED, of Missouri, that one of them shall not follow a certain calling or business within a period of 10 years within the whole State of Missouri or Illinois, if legal—and it must be considered to have been so held—is as complete a restraint of trade in so far as we could make it within that 10 years and within which time we both may die, not having any further time, and within that complete geography beyond which that particular matter need never have extended at all, and could within that geography serve its whole uses of a complete restraint. Therefore to the extent of the geography and to the extent of the time, if that contract of ours operates as a restraint of trade, it operates within the 10 years as completely as it would within a hundred years, and within those 10 years affects all those who would be injured by it, and they would be as completely injured within those 10 years as they would within 10 times 10 years. Therefore, if the theory of the law were, as my able friend says, merely to prevent restraint of trade, it would be perfectly apparent that a contract within certain limitations of territory or certain limitations of time could not be permitted, because the effect of such contracts would work the very same restraint within those qualifications of time and geography as if it extended for all time and all places. So I assure my able friend that I thought it was prohibited and the prohibition sustained on a different theory. This has been my idea: That they were sustained on the theory that a man could buy from another a certain form of good will and valuable assets for a certain sum of money or thing, and that in consideration of the sum he takes to himself he yields up the right of getting that same amount of money within certain same geography and a certain length of time and is a legitimate consideration by which he has been paid in an anticipatory way that which he might have been paid generally by customers in that length of time. That is the consideration on which it is sustained.

As to public policy, such a contract made between two individuals so far as the public is concerned will be sustained upon the idea that the particular nature of the business, supervised as it can be by the courts, can be clearly observed and does not in itself monopolize the opportunities of the citizen because of the subject matter involved and being one of those which is in general operation to the community at large.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LEWIS. Always, with pleasure, if the Senator will allow me to finish the thought I had in mind.

Mr. SHIELDS. What I desire to say is in that connection, but I will forbear.

Mr. LEWIS. There is much to be said as to the last distinction made by the Senator from Missouri, that it is not necessary that these things to be forbidden should be contrary to public morals, if they are contrary to public policy; but wherever a practice goes to such an extent that it is directly in violation of public policy it will, in my judgment, be treated as also a violation of public morals.

Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, before I read a passage from a case to which I desire all Senators to pay heed, as it is one that is giving me perturbation at this time.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I understand that a contract made by one who sells his business and the good will thereof to another that he will not engage in the same business within a limited territory and time is sustained, because the public interest is only affected and the agreement is necessary to support and protect the good will sold. Such contracts are held not to be unreasonable restraint of trade. If the contract stipulates that he will at no time engage in the same business or will not engage in it in any place in the United States, it is void and unenforceable. There are two reasons for this rule. One is that it deprives the citizen of the means of a livelihood, but the chief one is that it tends to monopoly.

Referring to the main question presented by the Senator, he is correct in his quotation of the case of Allgeyer against Louisiana. That case was cited and commented on in The United States against The Joint Traffic Association, but it was held not to be applicable to the Sherman law enacted to suppress restraints of trade and monopolies of commerce. The court in that case—the case of The United States against The Joint Traffic Association—said:

> The question really before us is whether Congress, in the exercise of its right to regulate commerce among the several States, or otherwise, has the power to prohibit, as in restraint of interstate commerce, a contract or combination between competing railroad corporations entered into and formed for the purpose of establishing and maintaining interstate rates and fares for the transportation of freight and passengers on any of the railroads, parties to the contract or combination, even though the rates and fares thus established are reasonable. Such an agreement directly affects and, of course, is intended to affect the cost of transportation of commodities, and commerce consists, among other things, of the transportation of commodities, and if such transportation be between States it is interstate commerce.

Thus the question was stated. In regard to the power of Congress, the court further said:

> We think it extends at least to the prohibition of contracts relating to interstate commerce, which would extinguish all competition between otherwise competing railroad corporations, and which would in that way restrain interstate trade or commerce. We do not think, when the grantees of this public franchise are competing railroads, seeking the business of transportation of men and goods from one State to another, that ordinary freedom of contract in the use and management of their property requires the right to combine as one consolidated and powerful association for the purpose of stifling competition among themselves, and of thus keeping their rates and charges higher than they might otherwise be under the laws of competition. And this is so, even though the rates provided for in the agreement may for the time be not more than are reasonable. They may easily and at any time be increased.

And, again, the court says:

> Notwithstanding the general liberty of contract which is possessed by the citizen under the Constitution, we find that there are many kinds of contracts which, while not in themselves immoral or mala in se, may yet be prohibited by the legislation of the States or, in certain cases, by Congress. The question comes back whether the statute under review is a legitimate exercise of the power of Congress over interstate commerce and a valid regulation thereof. The question is for us one of power only and not of policy. We think the power exists in Congress, and that the statute is therefore valid.

Mr. President, such statutes as this are simply police regulations; they are enacted in the exercise of the police power. While that power is not one of the enumerated powers of Congress, but remains in the States, yet Congress can exercise it whenever necessary to execute and carry into effect any of the expressed powers vested in it. In such cases it is implied—in this case the power to regulate commerce. The cases upon the subject all hold that the liberty of contract and personal liberty may be restrained when necessary for the public welfare. These rights are protected by the Constitution, and the power to enact laws for the public welfare is also provided for by the same instrument, and they must be enforced along with each other consistently and harmoniously. The only question here is, Are these statutes reasonable police regulations and reasonably calculated to effect the purposes intended; that is, to prevent restraints and monopolies of interstate commerce? If so, they are valid; and if not, they are void.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as I have introduced this somewhat debatable question—not particularly important, but introduced it merely by an interrogation of three of the Senators whose personal industry on this subject I have had occasion both to observe and admire—I will say it was not my object to enter into the field of discussion, either from the fundamental point of view or from the point of expediency on this legislation at all, but to suggest what I felt was a barrier, whether insuperable or not I am not able to say, that we might consider it and see if it exists to the extent that I fear. I concede that the distinction made by the able Senator from Tennessee is the one upon which we must sustain this legislation, if sustainable, but I illustrate by adopting the words of the Senator from Montana, as I listened to them with great care, wondering, knowing his capacity as I do, and paying tribute to it wherever I can, that he should have used that particular illustration to carry out the ultimate purpose, and thinking then, as I now think and shall express, that there was not brought to his mind the inapplicability of the illustration to his conclusion.

This is what agitates my fears: The Senator from Tennessee produces a case which in itself is a mere matter of interstate freight passing over railroads between States, clearly a subject within the Constitution. That no man would have a right to claim as justified a contract between A and C railroads and G and F railroads which made a monopoly of freight, interstate commerce, merely on the theory of the right to contract. Everyone must at once admit this fact, because the subject matter becomes at once, on the very face of it, interstate commerce and is very clearly, by the very subject, attaching itself to affairs between States, matters passing between States; and the able Senator from Tennessee has shown beyond dispute that the right of private contract could not be plead to sustain that.

This, however, is the distinction which I fear we run against: The able Senator from Montana used this figure of speech touching private local matters to bring it clearly to our mind. Said he: If I buy a typewriter from a typewriter concern, can that typewriter concern, merely because it has a patent—we will say the Remington or Oliver—say to me, "You shall buy from me your paper and your carbon or the towels used in your office, or the desk, or the coal for the fire?"—if I remember his speech.

Now, I say that they would not have a right to do such, as a matter of right or wrong, because such would be oppressive and obviously unfair. This must be conceded. That such would be an exaction that would be unjust under certain conditions must be admitted. That that would be mean, low, and contemptible to take advantage of the individual because he had to buy that particular typewriter will also be conceded. But this distinction is worrying me: What interstate-commerce feature, what governmental, constitutional feature, is involved in a contract between the Senator from Montana, the Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH, and a citizen of the city of Helena, with whom he may have a neighborly relation that leads to his asking, "Well, Mr. WALSH, have you come to buy a typewriter?" "Yes." "All right, sir. Now, in consideration of the price for which I let you have this machine, $40"—to use a figure of speech—"you also agree with me that the paper you print on or the carbon you use shall also be bought from me." Mr. WALSH says, "All right." The contract appears to be for a consideration, as follows: "That for the small price at which the typewriter is being sold, you agree to buy a certain quantity"—and that quantity may embrace all he may need for a certain time—"of these supplies of paper, carbon, soap, and towels."

I am insisting on this query: In what way does that infringe the interstate-commerce feature by which we can have here in Congress the right to prescribe that A and B in those States, in relation to that single bit of commodity that bears no relation to an interstate character, can be inhibited absolutely from making such an agreement as a private contract between the parties?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator seems to be addressing his remarks a little to me.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir. We are discussing it as lawyers in the forum.

Mr. REED. Manifestly, in the illustration given, the Government has nothing whatever to do with it and would have nothing to do with it. It is an intrastate transaction pure and simple, and neither this bill nor any other bill undertakes to deal with a case of that kind. That is a matter for legislation in the State of Montana. If, however, the Senator from Montana were in the city of New York and proceeded to make a contract with a citizen of Montana, and the citizen of Montana were to ship the typewriter to the Senator in New York and were to attach the trade condition we are speaking of to that sort of transaction, then, because it was an interstate transaction, the Government might have something to say.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. That brings me to the point that every contract you illustrate need only be within the State in which both parties live to carry out all the purposes which you seek to avoid.

Mr. REED. I do not agree with the Senator, provided he means it in one sense. If the Senator means that a builder of typewriters engaged in manufacturing them in the State of New York would establish an agency in the State of Montana, and then, through that agency, sell to a citizen of Montana in Montana a typewriter with these conditions attached, I do not think that that device or method would avoid the power of the Government, because the instrument itself is in fact the subject of interstate commerce, and the conditions made under those circumstances would probably be regarded as a mere subterfuge for the purpose of avoiding the Federal law.

We have that sort of difficulty with reference to every contract. For instance, the Steel Trust might, if it saw fit, have an agent in the State of Montana, and it might, through that agent, make a sale and attach conditions; yet I do not believe the Government in that case would be deprived of showing that the steel was actually shipped in interstate commerce, that the company's home was really in New Jersey, and that the method devised was a mere subterfuge to try to get away from the interstate-commerce provision. That is the way it seems to me.

Mr. LEWIS. What has the Senator to say as to this, then? I ask the able Senator from Tennessee likewise to note what I think is the distinction. If we are bothered at all, we are bothered by this:

The contract denounced by the Supreme Court of the United States was in a case where a man agreed to have certain insurance contracts between A, B, and C companies, extending from one State into another State, and the State attempted to pass laws within the State to prevent that. The State is much more of a sovereign than the Federal Government as to certain matters, we naturally recall.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is that the Louisiana case?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir; one phase of it. The Supreme Court of the United States says:

> The Supreme Court of Louisiana says that the act of writing within that State the letter of notification was an act therein done to effect an insurance on property then in the State in a marine insurance company which had not complied with its laws, and such act was, therefore, prohibited by the statute. As so construed, we think the statute is a violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, in that—

This is the point I wish to press on my able colleagues—how far the fourteenth amendment can be invoked; for if it applies to State legislation, of course it would apply to Federal legislation all the more—

> As so construed, we think the statute is a violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, in that it deprives the defendants of their liberty without due process of law. The statute which forbids such act does not become due process of law, because it is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the Union. The liberty mentioned in that amendment means not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned.

Then, says the court, proceeding, after referring to certain cases sustaining its conclusions:

The foregoing extracts have been made for the purpose of showing what general definitions have been given in regard to the meaning of the word "liberty," as used in the amendment, but we do not intend to hold that in no such case can the State exercise its police power. When and how far such power may be legitimately exercised with regard to these subjects must be left for determination to each case as it arises.

Has not a citizen of a State, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution above mentioned, a right to contract outside of the State—

Which, we will say in the illustration of my friend the able Senator from Missouri, would be in New York, to the citizen of Montana—outside of the State for insurance on his property—a right of which State legislation can not deprive him? We are not alluding to acts done within the State by an insurance company or its agents doing business therein, which are in violation of the State statutes. Such acts come within the principle of the Hooper case (supra), and would be controlled by it. When we speak of the liberty to contract for insurance or to do an act to effectuate such a contract already existing, we refer to and have in mind the facts of this case, where the contract was made outside the State, and as such was a valid and proper contract. The act done within the limits of the State under the circumstances of this case and for the purpose therein mentioned, we hold a proper act, one which the defendants were at liberty to perform and which the State legislature had no right to prevent, at least with reference to the Federal Constitution. To deprive the citizen of such a right as herein described without due process of law is illegal. Such a statute as this in question is not due process of law, because it prohibits an act which, under the Federal Constitution, the defendants had a right to perform.. This does not interfere in any way with the acknowledged right of the State to enact such legislation in the legitimate exercise of its police or other powers as to it may seem proper. In the exercise of such right, however, care must be taken not to infringe upon those other rights of the citizen which are protected by the Federal Constitution.

Then concluding, as I wish to conclude, with a mere observation:

In the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling or trade and of acquiring, holding, and selling property must be embraced the right to make all proper contracts in relation thereto, and although it may be conceded that this right to contract in relation to persons or property or to do business within the jurisdiction of the State may be regulated and sometimes prohibited when the contracts or business conflict with the policy of the State as contained in its statutes, yet the power does not and can not extend to prohibiting a citizen from making contracts of the nature involved in this case outside of the limits and jurisdiction of the State, and which are also to be performed outside of such jurisdiction; nor can the State legally prohibit its citizens from doing such an act as writing this letter of notification, even though the property which is the subject of the insurance may at the time when such insurance attaches be within the limits of the State.

Then the case proceeds, of course, to set forth the facts.

Mr. President, I have taken the liberty merely to bring this ruling to the attention of my able colleagues to revive their minds as to a matter which might have escaped their attention, or, being in their minds, might not have been fresh in its distinction. The fear I have, if I may call it a fear, is that if we shall adopt this amendment, or take the law as tendered by the Senators from Oklahoma and Montana, which on its face does nothing more than to prevent A from agreeing with B to buy some of B's ordinary commodities within the same city where they live—the contract being based upon a consideration satisfactory as between A and B, and bearing no relation in itself to the general subject of interstate commerce. Such legislation impresses me, however inexpedient from the point of morals and possibly of good justice, yet as not within the purview of this Federal Legislature or Federal legislation, and as directly in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, guaranteeing liberty in action as construed within this case I have now read. Mr. President, I have made my point, and now to further amplify it, would, I fear, burden you.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say just one word. There is no question that Congress can not interfere with transactions that are purely intrastate. There is no question, either, that Congress can pass any reasonable regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. REED. Let me finish the sentence.

Mr. CHILTON. I know what I am going to say will not interrupt the Senator. I want to call attention to the fact that this is probably the first time in the history of the Senate when the minority side has been entirely unrepresented on the floor of this body.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator was over on the Democratic side and I did not notice him.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator had better look around.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; my friend meant to be fair, but he simply looked on the other side.

Mr. CHILTON. That is right.

Mr. REED. He forgot the fact that there are three distinguished Republican Senators who have come over to this side——

Mr. LEWIS. May they remain!

Mr. REED. And in order to be perfectly fair it ought to be added that at the time the Senator rose there were upon this side of the Chamber exactly six Democrats present; so the Republicans have done pretty well. They have come over and joined us on our side and helped make this side look a little fuller, at least.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I just wanted to call attention to the silent prophecy in the fact that the Republican side of this Chamber is empty.

Mr. JONES. Not quite.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was only going to add a sentence to what I was saying. There is no question but that we can deal with interstate commerce, and as long as we are regulating interstate commerce in a reasonable way we can proceed without any difficulty. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I think there is a graver question involved in this legislation than he has suggested, and that is whether we are not, by much of this legislation, going beyond the regulation of the commerce itself and seeking to regulate the institution which may be engaged in commerce. That is a very grave question. I have not seen fit to undertake a discussion of it, because so far as I am concerned I have been interested in trying to have some effective legislation passed. I think the great trouble with the anti-trust legislation which we are now considering is that the thought embraced in the appeal of old King David, as his army went out to battle—is being applied to the trusts and monopolies of this country. I have not seen the slightest disposition in the Senate to put any teeth in this trust act. On the contrary, the doctrine most frequently advocated is that we ought to set up some kind of tribunal that will act as a sort of guardian ad litem for the trusts and monopolies of this country, and that we should proceed to hold up the light and kindly lead them into a safe country.

Deal gently with the young man Absalom for my sake—

Every attempt to put a substantive provision into the law has failed. Every attempt that has been made thus far to add a penalty, every attempt to strike a blow, has failed. You can get what our friend Perkins, of the Harvester Trust, and his protégé, Mr. Roosevelt, were clamoring for two years ago—a commission with a sort of legal warrant to roam at large, guided only by its own instincts, circumscribed alone by its own notions; a commission which, if it possesses the power to declare a thing illegal likewise possesses the power to declare it legal. If it possesses the power to go one whit beyond the present written law of this land, possesses the power to proceed to such length as it may see fit; and if it possesses the power to strike down one statute of the United States, it possesses the power to strike down all statutes of the United States relating to the subject matter consigned to it. If it possesses the power to set aside one decision of the court, a decision inimical to the public welfare as it may conceive or as we may conceive it, it likewise possesses the power to strike down every decision for the public benefit as we see it. Whenever you ask to put into the law an absolute prohibition, whenever you ask to write into the law language by which Congress says an act can not be done, we have hitherto been met by an insistent demand that no such language shall go into the law. That, I say to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], is the great danger confronting us.

We are of different views of thought here in the Senate. Some of us believe that the trade commission as it is now formed, with no substantive law back of it save the expression "unfair competition is hereby prohibited," will be a body either possessed of unlimited authority, and therefore a body that may strike down the wholesome laws we now know we possess, or else a body that will possess such limited authority that it can proceed nowhere except where it has a law to guide it, and therefore can not add one line to the law. Those two opposing views being here, it seems to me we ought to be able to agree that if the trade commission is to stand under this general authority, and with nothing but this general law as the measure of its authority, we should at least by substantive acts prohibit those practices which we know are wrong, and which can be reached without in any way destroying the trade commission, for we can prohibit contracts of the class being made by the Shoe Machinery Trust, by the typewriter and sewing machine manufacturers, and by other large classes of manufacturers which I will not stop to even name. We can safeguard the public against those wrongs by distinct enactment, and then if there be virtue in the trade commission it still can exist, and it will have these statutes in addition to all that now exist as its guide when it proceeds to work.

I am glad to know that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] substantially agrees with me that section 4 should be restored and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] substantially agrees with the Senator from Montana. I have no pride of opinion; I do not care in what form or in what exact phraseology we accomplish the result, so long as the result is accomplished. I do not think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is as broad as it ought to be, but I am delighted to find this evident disposition to put a little virility into the trust act that it does not now possess. I feel that this motion to reconsider ought to be passed now as a matter of course in order that the subject may be brought before Congress and that it may be here to be considered. Unless some one desires to speak upon it, I should like to have my motion to reconsider section 4 passed upon, in order that the subject may be opened up.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the amendment to which the Senator from Missouri has just referred?

Mr. REED. The proposition that is before the Senate is a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in striking out sections 2 and 4 of the Clayton bill, and I ask for a division of the question, so that we may vote upon reconsidering section 4.

The amendment I was just referring to as coming from the Senator from Montana, which I think is what the Senator from Iowa refers to, is a substitute the Senator from Montana has drawn, which, I understand, is very nearly the same as the bill brought in by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], relating to patented articles. I should like to have the motion to reconsider passed upon, and then, the matter being before the Senate, of course we can take up the question as to what is the proper amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the amendment. I did not know, in fact, that it had been offered. I am entirely willing that section 4 shall be reconsidered, for I do not agree with some of the Senators who have spoken upon the subject that it is covered by the unfair competition section of the trade commission bill, or at leat I am of the opinion that the greater number of the things covered by section 4 would not be covered by section 5 of the trade commission bill.

I have been opposed to section 4, not for the reason that it was embraced in the bill already passed but because I think it forbids certain things that are not only innocent but ought to be encouraged. The things that have been debated here are obviously bad and ought to be prohibited, but when we prohibit them we ought not to include in them certain other things that I think the trade of the country must be permitted to do in order to preserve the competition and the rivalry we are all in favor of.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator agrees with me, then, that the subject matter ought to be brought before Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. Then we can debate as to just what form it ought to be in. I thought maybe we could get a vote this morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. As the Senator from Missouri knows, I have been of the opinion all along that section 4 ought not to be stricken from the bill, because it was embraced in section 5 of the trades commission bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, while the motion to reconsider sections 2 and 4 has been separated, the motion to reconsider section 2 has not been abandoned or withdrawn, and there is pending a motion to reconsider the action of the committee in amending the bill by eliminating both sections 2 and 4, including the criminal clauses that the House placed upon both those sections.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask for a quorum?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Brady	Hollis	Myers	Simmons
Chamberlain	James	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Chilton	Johnson	Overman	Smoot
Clapp	Jones	Perkins	Swanson
Culberson	Kern	Pittman	Thomas
Cummins	Lane	Poindexter	Thompson
Dillingham	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Thornton
Fall	Lewis	Shafroth	Weeks
Fletcher	McLean	Sheppard	West
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Shields	White

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and also that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PAGE] is still detained at home on account of sickness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. STERLING answered to his name when called.

Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. NEWLANDS entered the Chamber and answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, after a careful consideration of the Sherman antitrust law, enacted July 2, 1890, to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and a review of the litigation conducted under it by the United States I am profoundly convinced of the wisdom of the provisions of the House bill contained in sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 prohibiting and penalizing local price cutting, what are known as tying contracts, holding companies, and other corporations from purchasing and controlling the capital stock of competitive corporations, and interlocking directorates in such corporations, for the purpose of lessening competition, restraining trade, and monopolizing commerce. The penalty provided in these sections, for those violating them, is imprisonment not exceeding one year and fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, in the discretion of the court.

In my opinion these sections contain all the real substantive law supplementary of the Sherman law to be found in the bill before us, and that without them it will fall far short of what the public has been led to expect from Congress, and what the common welfare of the country imperatively demands.

The committee amendments proposed before and since favorably reporting the bill are to strike out entirely sections 2 and 4 and the criminal clauses of sections 8 and 9, all of which I oppose.

I favor these sections because I believe that events since the enactment of the Sherman law have demonstrated that restraints of trade and monopolization of commerce can not be prevented and suppressed without certain and speedy criminal punishment of those who promote and organize them. In my opinion the penal provisions proposed will greatly facilitate such punishment, because the specific acts penalized can be detected and proven with ease, while it is difficult to ascertain and prove the complicated facts constituting completed conspiracies and monopolies, and if prohibited many monopolies will be defeated while in the stage of promotion.

I will undertake to show in the course of this discussion that the proceeding in equity which the Department of Justice has usually resorted to in attempting to enforce the Sherman law has proven a dismal failure for that purpose.

I will not read the sections of the House bill, to which I have referred, because the Senators have the bill on their desks and are familiar with them; but will content myself with reading some excerpts from the report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary recommending the bill for passage, which set forth and explain the provisions of these sections.

The committee, after stating section 2, prohibiting local price cutting, in explanation of it, says:

> There are two provisos in this section which are important. The first proviso permits discrimination in prices of commodities on account of differences in grade, quality, and quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation. The second proviso permits persons selling goods, wares, and merchandise in commerce to select their own customers, except as provided in section 3, which will be considered later. The necessity for legislation to prevent unfair discriminations in prices with a view of destroying competition needs little argument to sustain the wisdom of it. In the past it has been a most common practice of great and powerful combinations engaged in commerce—notably the Standard Oil Co. and others of less notoriety but of great influence—to lower prices of their commodities, oftentimes below the cost of production, in certain communities and sections where they had competition, with the intent to destroy and make unprofitable the business of their competitors, and with the ultimate purpose in view of thereby acquiring a monopoly in the particular locality or section in which the discriminating price is made. Every concern that engages in this evil practice must of necessity recoup its losses in the particular communities or sections where their commodities are sold below cost or without a fair profit by raising the price of this same class of commodities above their fair market value in other sections or communities. Such a system or practice is so manifestly unfair and unjust, not only to competitors who are directly injured thereby but to the general public, that your committee is strongly of the opinion that the present antitrust laws ought to be supplemented by making this particular form of discrimination a specific offense under the law when practiced by those engaged in commerce.

The necessity for such legislation is shown by the fact that 19 States have enacted laws forbidding this particular form of discrimination within their borders. These State statutes have practically all been enacted in the last few years, and most of them in the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. It is important that these State statutes be supplemented by additional legislation by Congress, for it is now possible for one of these great corporations doing business in not only the 48 States but throughout the world to lower the prices of its commodities in a particular State and sell within that State at a uniform price in compliance with State laws, and thereby destroy the business of all independent concerns and competitors operating within the State. The loss incurred by such gigantic effort in destroying competition can be more than regained by general increase in the prices of their commodities in other sections. In fact, complaint has been made to your committee that efforts have been made by certain great corporations engaged in commerce in some of the States which have enacted statutes forbidding such discrimination to circumvent the State laws by the methods above described. In seeking to enact section 2 into law we are not dealing with an imaginary evil or against ancient practices long since abandoned, but are attempting to deal with a real, existing, widespread, unfair, and unjust trade practice that ought at once to be prohibited in so far as it is within the power of Congress to deal with the subject. This, we think, is accomplished by section 2 of this bill.

Tying contracts, prohibited by section 4, are referred to in the report in these words:

Where the concern making these contracts is already great and powerful, such as the United Shoe Machinery Co., the American Tobacco Co., and the General Film Co., the exclusive or "tying" contract made with local dealers becomes one of the greatest agencies and instrumentalities of monopoly ever devised by the brain of man. It completely shuts out competitors not only from trade in which they are already engaged, but from the opportunities to build up trade in any community where these great and powerful combinations are operating under this system and practice. By this method and practice the Shoe Machinery Co. has built up a monopoly that owns and controls the entire machinery now being used by all great shoe manufacturing houses of the United States. No independent shoe manufacturer of shoe machines has the slightest opportunity to build up any considerable trade in this country while this condition obtains. If a manufacturer who is using machines of the Shoe Manufacturing Co. were to purchase and place a machine manufactured by any independent company in his establishment, the Shoe Machinery Co. could, under its contracts, withdraw all their machinery from the establishment of the shoe manufacturer, and thereby wreck the businesses of the manufacturer. The General Film Co., by the same method practiced by the Shoe Machinery Co., under the lease system, has practically destroyed all competition and acquired a virtual monopoly of all films manufactured and sold in the United States. When we consider contracts of sales made under this system, the result to the consumer, the general public, and the local dealer and his business is even worse than under the lease system.

The local dealer is required under the contract system to purchase and pay for each article secured for his business. He is required to contract for purchase on condition that he will not deal in like articles manufactured by competitors. If he can not sell the commodities so purchased, he must go out of business. It was shown in testimony before the committee during the recent hearings that a certain automobile manufacturing company, with a capital of only $2,000,000, had made a profit of $25,000,000 net on their investment in a single year. Was that a profit on the $2,000,000 actually invested by the manufacturing company? Not at all. It was the profit on that $2,000,000 supplemented by many times that many millions actually invested by local dealers in the machines of that company by so-called selling agencies throughout the country. The selling agencies are not in reality agencies at all, but are purchasers and owners of machines who have paid the full price therefor under contracts conditioned that these same dealers will not deal in the machines of any competitors or rival company. These extraordinary profits have been made largely on money actually invested in machines by customers, hundreds of which remain unsold in the possession of the local dealer. This illustration alone is sufficient to show the absolute unfairness of any such practice or system. The system is wholly bad for consumers and the general public and in its last analysis detrimental to the interests of the local dealers generally.

Section 8 is referred to in the report in these words:

Section 8 deals with what is commonly known as the "holding company," which is a common and favorite method of promoting monopoly. "Holding company" is a term generally understood to mean a company that holds the stock of another company or companies, but as we understand the term a "holding company" is a company whose primary purpose is to hold stocks of other companies. It has usually issued its own shares in exchange for these stocks and is a means of holding under one control the competing companies whose stock it has thus acquired. As thus defined, a "holding company" is an abomination, and in our judgment is a more incorporated form of the old-fashioned trust. * * * Section 8 is intended to eliminate this evil so far as it is possible to do so, making such exceptions from the law as seem to be wise, which exceptions have been found necessary by business experience and conditions, and the exceptions herein made are those which are not deemed monopolistic and do not tend to restrain trade.

The section prohibiting interlocking directorates is explained as follows:

Section 9 deals with the eligibility of directors in industrial corporations engaged in commerce, and provides that no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, other than common carriers which are subject to the act to regulate commerce, if such corporations are or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors, so that an elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the antitrust laws. In this it was not deemed necessary or advisable that interlocking directorates should be prohibited between the smaller industrial corporations. The importance of the legislation embodied in section 9 of this bill can not be overestimated. The concentration of wealth, money and property, in the United States under the control and in the hands of a few individuals or great corporations has grown to such an enormous extent that unless checked it will ultimately threaten the perpetuity of our institutions. The idea that there are only a few men in any of our great corporations and industries who are capable of handling the affairs of the same is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. From an economic point of view it is not possible that one individual, however capable, acting as a director in 50 corporations, can render as efficient and valuable service in directing the affairs of the several corporations under his control as can 50 capable men acting as single directors and devoting their entire time to directing the affairs of one of such corporations. The truth is that the only real service the same director in a great number of corporations renders is in maintaining uniform policies throughout the entire system for which he acts, which usually results to the advantage of the greater corporations and to the disadvantage of the smaller corporations, which he dominates by reason of his prestige as a director and to the detriment of the public generally.

Mr. President, I have read these excerpts with the risk of being tedious because they state the wrongful and vicious nature of the contracts, practices, and acts covered by sections 2, 4, 8, and 9, and the necessity of prohibiting and penalizing them, with great clearness and force and preclude all controversy concerning the merits of these sections of the bill.

The object of this bill, as expressed in its caption, is to "supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," the existing law here referred to being the Sherman antitrust law, for that is the only Federal statute upon this subject.

In order to determine what legislation is necessary to supplement the Sherman law, we must keep in mind the provisions of that statute, the wrongs they were intended to prohibit, and the remedy provided for the enforcement of the law, and wherein time and experience have shown that this remedy is not sufficient to accomplish the purpose of the law.

The title of that act is in these words: "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

The first three sections, it is conceded, contain all the substantive law of the act, and are as follows:

SECTION 1. Every contract combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The third section merely applies the first and second sections to the District of Columbia, and the then-existing Territories.

These sections are in form and substance criminal statutes. They prohibit conduct declared to be unlawful, and penalize disobedience with fine and imprisonment or both, and thus by all the authorities come within the definition of such statutes. The other sections of the act, five in number, authorizing the United States to bring suits in equity to restrain and enjoin monopolies, and persons sustaining special damages to bring civil actions, are additional remedies common in criminal legislation.

Concerning criminal legislation providing civil remedies to aid in their enforcement, a work of authority says:

A crime or public wrong is a breach and violation of the public rights and duties due to the whole community, considered as a community in its social aggregate capacity. An offense, however, which is punishable as a crime, may also cause special injury to individuals and give rise to civil actions if they can show that the injury suffered by them is distinct from that suffered by the general public, as in the case of an affray and assault and battery, a nuisance, and many other offenses.

Criminal laws are public laws, and are made for the protection of the whole people and not for the benefit of any person or class of persons. The purpose of the Sherman law is to prohibit and punish public wrongs from which the general public are the sufferers, and not to protect small dealers and competitors of monopolies who are few in number compared to the great masses from whom tribute is exacted. The laws for the punishment of homicide are criminal laws for the protection of the public against violence to the person, resulting in death, and have been in force from the earliest history of the English people. The passage of Lord Campbell's act by the British Parliament some time about the middle of the last century, and the enactment of similar statutes by the several States of the Union, allowing civil actions to the next of kin for injuries to the deceased, did not change their character; they are still criminal laws, and the civil actions allowed are but further penalties for the criminal conduct of the guilty parties.

Mr. President, before further discussing the Sherman law I wish to direct attention to the conditions that called for its enactment.

The laws of this country were not framed for the prohibition and punishment of modern monopolies and were inadequate for that purpose.

A monopoly, in its original form, as defined by Sir William Blackstone in his Commentaries, was "a grant from the sovereign power of the State by commission, letters patent, or otherwise, to any person or corporation, by which the exclusive right of buying, selling, making, working, or using anything was given." Monopolies of this character never existed in this country, and were abolished in England by the Parliament during the reign of Elizabeth and her immediate successors on the throne.

Monopolies of the present time are, generally, combinations of men and capital which, by the power thus obtained and exercised, destroy competition in trade and restrain and absorb commerce in some commodity, generally some prime necessity of life, to their exclusive advantage and profit, and to the detriment of the public.

Mr. Justice Jackson, while on the circuit bench in the case In re Greene (52 Fed. Rep., 116), said:

> A monopoly, in the prohibited sense, involves the element of an exclusive privilege or grant which restrained others from the exercise of a right or liberty which they had before the monopoly was secured. In commercial law it is the abuse of free commerce which one or more individuals have procured the advantage of selling alone or exclusively of all of a particular kind of merchandise or commodity to the detriment of the public.

Contracts and agreements made to restrain trade, or which necessarily tend to lessen and destroy competition and monopolize commerce to the detriment of the public, were by the common law against public policy and void, and the courts invariably refused to enforce them. But the common law provided no civil or criminal remedy for wrongs of this character, unmixed with fraud, unless they assumed the form of unlawful conspiracies which were both actionable and indictable.

The criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is confined solely to misdemeanors and crimes denounced by acts of Congress, it never having been extended to include common-law offenses.

The criminal laws of this country, therefore, provided no punishment for those restraining trade and monopolizing commerce except where the transaction constituted an unlawful conspiracy, and the power to punish conspiracy was confined to the courts of the several States.

In the latter part of the last century combinations, conspiracies, and monopolies of the character described multiplied in number and capital invested and were more exacting in their extortions than ever before known, and fabulous fortunes were rapidly accumulated by those organizing them from the tribute which they levied upon the people. The public demanded relief from their oppression. The majority of the States in the period between 1880 and 1890 responded to this demand and enacted laws making all contracts, agreements, combinations, conspiracies, and schemes for destroying competition, restraining trade, and monopolizing commerce high misdemeanors and felonies, and the most of these statutes also provided civil actions in favor of individuals who sustained damages from the acts prohibited not common to the general public. These statutes, because their operation was confined to the territorial boundaries of the States and to intrastate commerce, proved insufficient for the purposes for which they were enacted. The necessity for Federal legislation became apparent to everyone, and the demand for it came from all parts of the United States. The great political parties of the day in their platforms adopted in national conventions recognized the existence of these wrongs and the necessity of legislation to protect the people from them, and pledges were made to enact suitable legislation for that purpose.

Senator Sherman, of Ohio, introduced a bill in the United States Senate December 4, 1889, to carry out the pledges of his party. It was fitting that he should do so, because the greatest of these monopolies, the Standard Oil Co., had its home in his State, and the courts of Ohio had grappled with and attempted to suppress it without substantial success. The measure was not partisan. The most distinguished and able Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of both great political parties took great interest in it, and it was continually before the Senate or House, or committees of those bodies, in some form until July 2, 1890, when it was enacted into law. While the statute is radically different from the original bill introduced by Senator Sherman, it bears his name and is generally known as the Sherman law.

There has been much controversy concerning the authorship of this law. Mr. Albert H. Walker, a distinguished member of the New York bar, and author of the "History of the Sherman Law," after a full investigation, stated in a letter to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the result of his researches, a part of which I will read as a matter of history. It is as follows:

> That statute (meaning the present Sherman law) was drawn in the Judiciary Committee in the latter part of March and the first part of April, 1890. It was based on the bill which Senator Sherman introduced as Senate bill 1 early in December, 1889, but Senator Sherman took no part in framing the substitute, which was drawn by the Judiciary Committee. That committee was composed of Senators Edmunds, Ingalls, Hoar, Wilson of Iowa, Evarts, Coke, Vest, George, and Pugh. All of its members participated in the consideration of the framing of the statute as it was reported by the Judiciary Committee, which is the exact form in which it was enacted and was approved by President Harrison July 2, 1890. The eight sections of the statute were written by the following Senators in the following proportions: Senator Edmunds wrote all of sections 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6, except seven words in section 1, which seven words were written by Senator Evarts. Those are the words "in the form of trust or otherwise." Senator George wrote all of section 4; Senator Hoar wrote all of section 7, and Senator Ingalls was the author of section 8.

Mr. President, having given this brief history of the Sherman law and the public wrongs which it was intended to prohibit and punish, I will direct the attention of the Senators to what has been done toward enforcing it.

Although the criminal character of this law can not be mistaken or denied, the history of the litigation instituted and conducted under it shows that the incidental civil remedies provided for its enforcement have been ingeniously and artfully brought to the front and made to appear as the prominent and remedial part of the legislation to the neglect of the criminal penalties denounced. Indeed, the Department of Justice seemed to forget not only the criminal character but the very existence of the law. As a result of this construction and neglect during the period between 1890 and 1900 trusts and monopolies continued to increase in number and magnitude, and were extended to the control and monopolization of almost every article and branch of commerce.

Statutes were enacted by New Jersey and some other States providing for the incorporation of holding companies, which took the place of the original form of trusts. Organizing these combinations became a profitable business and engaged the attention of the great financiers and banking houses of the country. I was recently told by one of the counsel for the Government in the suit brought to dissolve the United States Steel Co. that a banking firm in New York received $120,000,000 of the stock of that corporation for services rendered in organizing it.

The law through all this period was practically a dead letter, and few suits were brought and prosecuted to enforce it. I have the number brought by the United States, showing how many were begun under each administration since the law was passed, which I believe to be reliable. It is as follows:

President Harrison's administration, 4 bills in equity and 3 indictments	7
President Cleveland's administration, 4 bills in equity, 2 indictments, and 2 informations for contempt	8
President McKinley's administration, 3 bills in equity	3
President Roosevelt's administration, 18 bills in equity, 25 indictments, and 1 forfeiture proceeding	44
President Taft's administration, 47 bills in equity, and 42 indictments	89
President Wilson's administration, 10 bills in equity and 8 indictments	18
Total suits and prosecutions brought previous to Dec. 1, 1913	171

The convictions in the criminal cases have been few, and I am informed these have been of inferior officers and agents.

The cases brought and prosecuted to final judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States against the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the American Tobacco Co., of New Jersey, have attracted more attention than all the others. The court held in the Standard Oil case, Mr. Chief Justice White delivering the opinion, that the words and phrases "restraint of trade," "monopolization," and "attempt to monopolize commerce," found in the statute, there being nothing in the context to the contrary, must be presumed to have been used in their common-law sense, and when so interpreted the statute only applied to and prohibited contracts and combinations which unduly or unreasonably restrained trade. This construction of the statute, although not necessary to the decision of this case, as the combination attacked in it was held to be vicious and unreasonable in the highest degree, is accepted as the final word concerning the meaning and prohibitory force of the law. It had been previously understood that all combinations which restrained trade or monopolized commerce to the prejudice of the public, whether reasonable or unreasonable, were under the common law against public policy and unlawful, but the holding in this case seems to be to the contrary. The practical application of the statute under this construction to criminal conspiracies and monopolies will be awaited with some interest.

The Standard Oil Co. in the form of a trust was in existence when the Sherman law was passed, and was referred to in the discussions in the Senate and House of Representatives as one of the monopolies to be suppressed by that act, but no proceeding was instituted against it until some time about 1908, and the suit in equity then brought was not decided until May, 1911. The American Tobacco Co. was proceeded against by bill in equity about the same time, and the case also finally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in May, 1911. The individual defendants in these cases—7 in the Standard Oil Co. case and 29 in the American Tobacco Co. case—were not prosecuted, although it was found in each case that these defendants were the promoters, organizers, and beneficiaries of the combinations held to be violating the Sherman law.

President Taft, in a message to Congress December 5, 1911, speaking of the decrees in these cases, said:

> We have been 21 years making this statute effective for the purpose for which it was enacted. The Knight case was discouraging and seemed to remit to the States the whole available power to attack and suppress the evils of the trusts. Slowly, however, the error of that judgment was corrected, and only in the last three or four years has the heavy hand of the law been laid upon the great illegal combinations that have exercised such an absolute dominion over many of our industries. Criminal prosecutions have been brought and a number are pending, but juries have felt averse to convicting for jail sentences and judges have been most reluctant to impose such sentences on men of respectable standing in society whose offense has been regarded as merely statutory. Still, as the offense becomes better understood, and the committing of it partakes more of studied and deliberate defiance of the law, we can be confident that juries will convict individuals and that jail sentences will be imposed.
> In the Standard Oil Co. case the Supreme and Circuit Courts found the combination to be a monopoly of the interstate business of refining, transporting, and marketing petroleum and its products, effected and maintained through 37 different corporations, the stock of which was held by a New Jersey company. It, in effect, commanded the dissolution of this combination, directed the transfer and pro rata distribution by the New Jersey company of the stock held by it in the 37 corporations to and among its stockholders; and the corporations and individual defendants were enjoined from conspiring or combining to restore such monopoly; and all agreements between the subsidiary corporations tending to produce or bring about further violations of the act were enjoined.
> In the Tobacco case the court found that the individual defendants, 29 in number, had been engaged in a successful effort to acquire complete dominion over the manufacture, sale, and distribution of tobacco in this country and abroad, and that this had been done by combinations made with a purpose and effect to stifle competition, control prices, and establish a monopoly, not only in the manufacture of tobacco, but also of tin foil and licorice used in its manufacture and of its products of cigars, cigarettes, and snuffs. The tobacco suit presented a far more complicated and difficult case than the Standard Oil suit, for a decree which could effectuate the will of the courts and end the violation of the statute. There was here no single holding company as in the Standard Oil Trust. The main company was the American Tobacco Co., a manufacturing, selling, and holding company. The plan adopted to destroy the combination and restore competition involved the redivision of the capital and plants of the whole trust between some of the companies constituting the trust and new companies organized for the purpose of the decree and made parties to it, and numbering, new and old, 14.
> The American Tobacco Co. (old), readjusted capital, $92,000,000; the Liggett & Meyers Tobacco Co. (new), capital, $67,000,000; the P. Lorillard Co. (new), capital, $47,000,000; and the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. (old), capital, $7,525,000, are chiefly engaged in the manufacture and sale of chewing and smoking tobacco and cigars. The former one tin-foil company is divided into two, one of $825,000 capital and the other of $400,000. The one snuff company is divided into three companies, one with a capital of $15,000,000, another with a capital of $8,000,000, and a third with a capital of $8,000,000. The licorice companies are two, one with a capital of $5,758,300 and another with a capital of $2,000,000. There is also the British-American Tobacco Co., a British corporation, doing business abroad, with a capital of $26,000,000; the Porto Rican Tobacco Co., with a capital of $1,800,000; and the corporation of United Cigar Stores, with a capital of $9,000,000.
> Under this arrangement each of the different kinds of business will be distributed between two or more companies, with a division of the prominent brands in the same tobacco products, so as to make competition not only possible but necessary. Thus the smoking-tobacco business of the country is divided so that the present independent companies have 21.39 per cent, while the American Tobacco Co. will have 33.08 per cent, the Liggett & Meyers Co. 20.05 per cent, the Lorillard Co. 22.82 per cent, and the Reynolds Co. 2.66 per cent. The stock of the other 13 companies, both preferred and common, has been taken from the defendant American Tobacco Co. and has been distributed among its stockholders. All covenants restricting competition have been declared null and further performance of them has been enjoined. The preferred stock of the different companies has now been given a voting power, which was denied it under the old organization. The ratio of the preferred stock to the common was as 78 to 40. This constitutes a very decided change in the character of the ownership and control of each company.
> In the original suit there were 29 defendants who were charged with being the conspirators through whom the illegal combination acquired and exercised its unlawful dominion. Under the decree these defendants will hold amounts of stock in the various distributee companies ranging from 41 per cent as a maximum to 28½ per cent as a minimum, except in the case of one small company, the Porto Rican Tobacco Co., in which they will hold 45 per cent. The 29 individual defendants are enjoined for three years from buying any stock except from each other, and the group is thus prevented from extending its control during that period. All parties to the suit and the new companies who are made parties are enjoined perpetually from in any way effecting any combination between any of the companies in violation of the statute by way of resumption of the old trust. Each of the 14 companies is enjoined from acquiring stock in any of the others. All these companies are enjoined from having common directors or officers, or common buying or selling agents, or common officers, or lending money to each other.

Mr. President, the decree pronounced in the American Tobacco Co. case is an anomaly, a most remarkable anomaly, in equity practice, procedure, and judicature. I doubt whether anything approaching it can be found in the history of equity jurisprudence. It is difficult to understand upon what principle or authority the United States circuit court assumed and exercised the power to administer a monopoly held by the Supreme Court to have been organized and doing business, in violation of the criminal laws of the United States.

The Sherman law, section 4, under which the bill was filed, does not confer such authority. The jurisdiction there conferred upon the courts of the United States is "to prevent and restrain violations of the act," when proceedings are instituted for that purpose, by injunction or otherwise, and not to administer them. Courts of equity have no general inherent jurisdiction to protect and enforce the interests of parties growing out of unlawful contracts, conspiracies, and monopolies. The familiar maxim that "he who comes into equity must come with clean hands" appplies in such cases. The illegality of the transaction need not be pleaded, but the court will repel the guilty parties of its own motion when the unlawful character of the transaction appears in any way at any stage of the cause.

Mr. President, this decree was not a real and substantial dissolution of the American Tobacco Co. The court merely divided the monopoly among its several promoters and owners. A Cæsarean operation was performed upon the New Jersey corporation, the mother monopoly, and the nine subsidiary corporations which it had absorbed, and the new ones, begotten after the corporations had been declared to be unlawful, were brought forth and authorized to continue their business with the stamp of approval of the court upon them.

Mr. REED. They saved the offspring and the mother, too.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes. They were all turned loose together to continue their operations, with the admonition that the mother should not again gather them together for a period of three years.

All the combined monopolistic corporations continued their same business. The stockholders of the American Tobacco Co. of New Jersey became stockholders in nearly all the other companies, and there was no real change in their interest by this new arrangement. Who can believe that there is any real competition between the stockholders of these several companies? They are all copartners with a common interest, working together with a perfect understanding for a common purpose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but to ask him if he does not think corporations in which there is a common stock ownership ranging as high as from 28 to 45 per cent, as shown in the decree he has read, are in fact all the time under one management?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do; and such is the substance of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against the Union Pacific Railroad Co.

Mr. President, I do not make these comments upon this decree in criticism of the court, but to show that the only successful and efficient way to prohibit restraints of trade and monopolization of commerce is by criminal punishment of those who may be guilty of such unlawful conduct.

I can not conceive how anyone, with the decree pronounced in the American Tobacco Co. case before him, can have the fortitude to assert that a suit in equity is an efficient remedy to suppress and destroy conspiracies to monopolize commerce. This decree, to my mind, is a demonstration that this remedy is an absolute failure, and that the purpose of the law can never be accomplished through it. I hope that the bill we have under consideration will be so amended as to prohibit courts from administering monopolies for the benefit of monopolists, and will require that all combinations adjudged to be unlawful be placed in the hands of receivers and dissolved.

Mr. President, in justification of this decree it was said, and may be said in regard to other combinations when decreed to be unlawful, that there were innocent stockholders who would suffer without the protecting care of the court. This may be true, but these comparatively small interests can not authorize the perpetuation of a monopoly or justify a miscarriage of justice. These small stockholders were charged with notice of the unlawful character of the combination when they purchased their stock, and they must take the consequences when it is condemned. The Sherman law and all the proceedings authorized under it concern the redress of public wrongs, and the penalties for violating the law can not be arrested to protect private interests.

Mr. President, what effect did the result in these cases have upon monopolies? Did they go out of business? No. The decrees pronounced had no terrors for them. They continued to flourish as if the Sherman law had never been passed.

Mr. Albert H. Walker, in a pamphlet published by him September 11, 1912, says:

Proceeding upon that working hypothesis, it is necessary to state at this place the existence of more than a thousand holding companies in the United States which, respectively, combine the operations of nearly 10,000 industrial corporations, being an average of nearly 10 subsidiary corporations confederated together under the control of each of the 1,000 holding companies.

During President Taft's administration actions have been prosecuted for violations of the Sherman law against a few of those holding organizations, including the United States Steel Corporation, the American Tobacco Co., the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the American Sugar Refining Co., and the International Harvester Co., but more than a thousand other holding-company organizations of the same general character and mode of operation have been entirely undisturbed in their regular business of violating the Sherman law throughout the administration of President Taft. The following is a list of 50 of those undisturbed holding companies, which list includes their names, their capitalization, and an approximation of the number of the subsidiary corporations controlled by them, respectively.

Name of holding company.	Capitalization.	Subsidiaries.
Amalgamated Copper Co.	$155,000,000	12
American Smelting & Refining Co.	100,000,000	14
American Can Co.	88,000,000	73
American Woollen Co.	80,000,000	28
Central Leather Co.	80,000,000	14
Corn Products Refining Co.	80,000,000	7
United Copper Co.	80,000,000	2
United States Rubber Co.	75,000,000	14
United States Refining & Mining Co.	75,000,000	12
Pittsburg Coal Co.	64,000,000	16
American Car & Foundry Co.	60,000,000	19
Lackawanna Steel Co.	60,000,000	3
Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co.	58,000,000	6

Pressed Steel Car Co.	25,000,000	8
United Fruit Co.	25,000,000	12
United Lead Co.	25,000,000	20
International Nickel Co.	24,000,000	7
American Writing Paper Co.	22,000,000	32
American Beet Sugar Co.	20,000,000	3
Union Typewriter Co.	20,000,000	7
Royal Baking Powder Co.	20,000,000	6
International Silver Co.	20,000,000	21
Sloss-Sheffield & Iron Co.	20,000,000	11

Mr. Walker continues:

The foregoing 50 holding companies have a capitalization of more than $2,300,000,000 and have more than 700 subsidiary corporations, the average number of their subsidiary corporations being more than 15 and their average capitalization being more than $46,000,000.

I can furnish a list of more than 950 other industrial holding companies which have an aggregate capitalization of more than $5,000,000,000, with more than 6,000 subsidiary corporations, but I will not expand this pamphlet enough to make it include that list, though I do not doubt that most of those holding companies and subsidiary corporations are regularly engaged in violating the Sherman law. But most of them are less extensively thus engaged than is each of the 50 holding companies, with their subsidiary corporations, which are specified in the foregoing list.

Mr. John Moody, editor of Moody's Magazine and compiler of Moody's Manual of Corporations, prepared a list of holding companies and other corporations violating the Sherman law in the summer of 1912, which was published in the Democratic campaign book of that year. This list contains some 300 in number, and gives the date when incorporated, the number of plants acquired and controlled, and the total outstanding capital of each corporation. An examination of it will be profitable to anyone interested.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the Senator called attention to a list of some 300 corporations which were designated as trusts and combines in violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did refer to such a list, published by Mr. John Moody and used by the Democratic Party in the campaign of 1912.

Mr. BORAH. How many of those 300 are still in existence?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no evidence of over 30 of them having been brought to justice. From the public press and from the records of the Department of Justice I think some 25 or 30 have been suppressed since March 4, 1913. How many were suppressed in the latter part of the last administration I do not know.

Mr. BORAH. I did not ask my question from a partisan standpoint.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not intend my reply to have that coloring. This is not a partisan matter.

Mr. BORAH. I asked it to illustrate a thought which I suggested the other day, namely, that what we need in these days is execution of the law rather than the making of more laws on this subject. There is not any doubt but that the execution of the law would destroy every one of those 300 monopolies if we had a mind to put the law into execution as we now have it. The difficulty arises out of a fear to execute the law rather than the fact that we have not sufficient laws to do the business.

Mr. SHIELDS. I believe we have sufficient law, but I think that some supplementary legislation will facilitate the enforcement of the Sherman law, and I am now insisting that that which it is proposed to enact shall be efficient for that purpose.

Mr. President, the facts I have stated are well known and have convinced the majority of our public men, and of the people of all classes and all parties, that the Sherman law should be supplemented by legislation prohibiting and penalizing the schemes and devices defined and described in sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of the House bill, which it is conceded are commonly used and employed in forming and carrying on monopolies of commerce. This assertion is easily proven.

Senator Edmunds, the author of the sections containing the criminal provisions of the Sherman law, in an article in the North American Review, December, 1911, said:

It may be truly said that within the last 10 years, with one or two exceptions, the Department of Justice has been with ability and earnestness prosecuting on the equity side of the United States courts prominent cases of violations of the act in various parts of the country with much success, as also some criminal prosecutions; but so long as the penal provisions of the act remain generally in abeyance and the consequences of the violations of it fall entirely or chiefly upon the stockholders in corporations and the common funds of those interested in such enterprises, there is a great probability that the mischief will not be suppressed, and trustees, directors, and managers may grow rich, while stockholders and trusting investors, as well as great numbers of independent and fair traders grow poor.

President Taft, in his message to Congress December 11, 1911, which, it will be remembered, was after the Standard Oil Co. and American Tobacco Co. cases were decided, concerning the necessity of such supplementary legislation, said:

Much is said of the repeal of this statute and of constructive legislation intended to accomplish the purpose and blaze a clear path for honest merchants and business men to follow. It may be that such a plan will be evolved, but I submit that the discussions which have been brought out in recent days by the fear of the continued execution of the antitrust laws have produced nothing but glittering generalities, and have offered no line of distinction or rule of action as definite and as clear as that which the Supreme Court itself lays down in enforcing the statute.

I see no objection, and indeed I can see decided advantages, in the enactment of a law which shall describe and denounce methods of competition which are unfair and are badges of the unlawful purpose to suppress a competitor by underselling him at a price so unprofitable as to drive him out of business or the making of exclusive contracts with customers under which they are required to give up association with other manufacturers, and the numerous kindred methods for stifling competition and effecting monopoly should be described with sufficient accuracy in a criminal statute on the one hand to enable the Government to shorten its task by prosecuting single misdemeanors instead of an entire conspiracy, and, on the other hand, to serve the purpose of pointing out more in detail to the business community what must be avoided.

President Taft, while presiding in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the Sixth Circuit, heard many cases involving the construction and application of the Sherman law, and gave the matter careful attention while Chief Executive, and his views upon these questions are entitled to the highest respect.

The people, through their representatives in the great national conventions of the Democratic and Republican Parties, have declared for such legislation.

The Republican platform adopted at Chicago in 1912 contains a declaration in these words:

The Republican Party favors the enactment of legislation supplementary to the existing antitrust act which will define as criminal offenses those specific acts that uniformly mark attempts to restrain and to monopolize trade, to the end that those who honestly intend to obey the law may have a guide for their action, and that those who aim to violate the law may the more surely be punished.

A Federal trade commission was also favored in this platform.

This thoroughly committed the Republican Party to legislation penalizing the means commonly used in restricting trade and monopolizing commerce, evidently under the advice of President Taft in the message from which I have read.

The Democratic platform of 1904 contained a declaration in these words:

We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary to effectively suppress them.

Any trust or unlawful combination engaged in interstate commerce which is monopolizing any branch of business or production should not be permitted to transact business outside of the State of its origin. Whenever it shall be established in any court of competent jurisdiction that such monopolization exists, such prohibition should be enforced through comprehensive laws to be enacted on the subject.

The platform of this party adopted in 1908 said:

We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. Among the additional remedies we specify three: First, a law preventing a duplication of directors in competing corporations; second, a license system which will, without abridging the right of each State to create corporations or its right to regulate as it will the foreign corporations doing business within its limits, make it necessary for a manufacturing or trading corporation engaged in interstate commerce to take out a Federal license before it shall be permitted to control as much as 25 per cent of the products in which it deals, the license to protect the public from watered stock and to prohibit the control by such corporations of more than 50 per cent of the total amount of any product consumed in the United States; and, third, a law compelling such licensed corporations to sell all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms, after making the allowance for the cost of transportation.

The declaration in the Baltimore platform, 1912, is as follows:

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including among others the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, or discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions. * * *

This platform contains no declaration in favor of a trade commission of any kind.

President Wilson, in an earnest desire and determination to carry out the platform pledges of his party, and with a profound conviction of the necessity of legislation of this character, in a special message read by him to both Houses of Congress in joint assembly, January 20 last, in language clear, direct, and forceful, such as few men, if any, can command, the meaning of which is unmistakable, said:

Legislation has its atmosphere like everything else, and the atmosphere of accommodations and mutual understandings which we now breathe with so much refreshment is a matter of sincere congratulation. It ought to make our task very much less difficult and embarrassing than it would have been had we been obliged to continue to act amid the atmosphere of suspicion and antagonism which has so long made it impossible to approach such questions with dispassionate fairness. Constructive legislation, when successful, is always the embodiment of convincing experience, and of the mature public opinion which finally springs out of that experience. Legislation is a business of interpretation, not of origination; and it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter. It is not a recent or hasty opinion. It springs out of the experience of a whole generation. It has clarified itself by long contest, and those who for a long time battled with it and sought to change it are now frankly and honorably yielding to it and seeking to conform their actions to it. * * *

The business of the country awaits also, has long awaited, and has suffered because it could not obtain further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is.

I now come to the part of the message recommending the character of legislation I am favoring:

Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

The President does not confine his recommendations to the creation of a trade commission, but advises that those acts and transactions which are the usual badges of monopoly be penalized, as proposed in sections 2 and 4 and 8 and 9 of the House bill. The House has followed the platform pledges of both parties and the advice of the President, and there is no good reason why the Senate should not do so.

Mr. President, there must be some wisdom in measures which all people believe to be good, favor, and demand be enacted into law.

But it is said that the provisions of these sections are too drastic and will, if enacted into law disturb business. I grant you they will disturb the business of monopolists. I hope they will, for that is my object in urging that they be enacted into law. It is what the people want done.

No fears of this kind are expressed by the small dealers. The consumers are not complaining. They are not alarmed at the probable disturbance of the business of the monopolists.

I will read further from Senator Edmunds's article in the North American Review on this subject. His familiarity with these matters and his ability justify my doing so. He says:

It is to be hoped and may be confidently expected that with a clear realization of the power and duty of those intrusted with the execution of the laws every one of the remedial clauses of the act—equity, injunctions, interdicts, and mandates, fines, forfeitures, and imprisonments—will be brought into full exercise without fear or favor. The evils are great and the remedies must be applied. But if it is said that in doing this the "business operations and interests" of the country will be disturbed and upset. Well? If the "business interests" of the great and wide-spread combinations, as now carried on, are crushing out smaller enterprises and monopolizing industries that should be fairly and equally open to all, and controlling and enhancing the prices of almost everything needed in every household, must suffer from the enforcement of equal laws necessary to the welfare of the whole people, it is the consequence of their evil doing and must be borne, and every honest and fair enterprise will survive for the good of all. Wealth and power justly used are beneficial to all. Capital is essential to the beginning and conduct of large enterprises, but it is absolutely useless without the cooperation of willing labor, while without it labor can have little employment and little compensation. Neither can prosper without the other. Coordination and cooperation and good will are equally necessary to both; without them neither socialism, nor the initiative, nor the referendum, nor the recall will help anybody except the "politician" and the "bosses" and the agitators who agitate for selfish ends, and of such there always have been and always will be plenty.

This, I think, disposes of the business-disturbance argument.

But it is said that the Federal trade commission furnishes a remedy for the wrongs denounced by these sections of the House bill. I do not think so. I hope that commission will be of service to the country, but I fear this hope will not be realized.

The jurisdiction of the commission is confined to "unfair competition" between dealers. It is merely a school of good manners for competitive dealers. It has no power to restrain or prohibit restraints of trade and monopolies prejudicial to consumers and the general public; this was conceded in the discussion of the bill in this Chamber. Therefore it can not punish the fraudulent transactions and conduct penalized by the House bill, which are all of that character. It does not provide for criminal penalties for offending parties. It has no effective power to do anything within itself. The only power given it is to bring a bill in equity in the Federal courts to enjoin the continuance of what it may declare to be "unfair competition."

Mr. REED. And, Mr. President, in the meantime, while these proceedings are going on the gentlemen who have been pursuing methods of unfair competition continue to realize profits.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly, the consumer, whom we are trying to protect, gets no benefit from this proceeding. His rights and wrongs are not provided for in that bill. The commission is for the benefit of dealers.

And if the offending party fails to obey the injunction and is arrested for contempt he will likely, under the provision of this bill, be entitled to a jury trial, and thus the proceeding be prolonged indefinitely by mistrials and continuances until all are tired out and the case is abandoned.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, possibly it was due to inattention, but I do not really understand the line of argument the Senator is now pursuing. What is the condition that the Senator has in mind where there might be several mistrials by reason of a disagreement of the jury?

Mr. SHIELDS. Conditions ordinarily attending jury trials. They are familiar to every lawyer.

Mr. WALSH. What kind of prosecution has the Senator in mind?

Mr. SHIELDS. A prosecution for contempt of court in violating an injunction.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to know whether I am right in this view of the matter: As I understand this bill, first, the violation of the injunction must be an act that is in and of itself a crime either against the laws of the United States or against one of the States. Unless it is a crime, the ancient remedy is not interfered with at all. Is not that true?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not so understand the bill as it now stands.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is also true that the trial by jury for contempt does not apply in cases brought by the United States.

Mr. REED. A case for contempt would not be a case brought by the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, the United States enforces the antitrust law exclusively, so far as injunctions under it are concerned.

Mr. SHIELDS. I trust that the Senator will give attention to the provisions relating to injunctions when we reach those sections.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply wanted to be sure that I was right, because I have a good deal of confidence in the views of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee, as well as the attention of the Senator from Iowa, to the fact that under the original antitrust act of 1890 only the Government, through its Attorney General and the district attorneys, can obtain injunctive relief. By section 14 of this bill for the first time the same remedy is given to private parties as was given to the Government under the antitrust laws. If that is the case, if private parties are to be given the same relief by injunctive process under the antitrust law as is the Government, why should not they have the same remedies in respect to contempt as the Government of the United States has under like circumstances?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think all parties should have the same protection from the courts of the country.

Mr. President, no law can be enforced without a certain and prompt remedy. Merely declaring a thing unlawful is a farce, so far as prohibiting the act is concerned unless a punishment is provided for those who do the prohibited thing.

Blackstone, in his Commentaries, says that all criminal laws must, to be efficient, provide certain and speedy punishment for those violating them, and the experience of all countries proves this to be true.

A justice of the peace in my State, exercising his common sense, unconsciously gave expression to this in a case before him in the days of slavery. Slaves were allowed to testify, first being admonished, as are children of tender age, concerning false swearing; the penalty for testifying falsely being, in the language of the old statute, "forty lashes save one, on the bare back, well laid on." A negro was called as a witness, and the squire proceeding to admonish and instruct him, asked if he knew the consequences of false swearing. He replied, "Yes; I will go to hell." The squire promptly said, "a devil of a sight worse than that; you'll get 39 lashes on your bare back before you leave here." The squire was evidently of the opinion that the fear of this certain and speedy punishment would be more effective in causing the negro to speak the truth than that of what might befall him in the unknown hereafter, and doubtless he reasoned well.

Whenever criminal penalties are provided for monopoly and the punishment made certain and speedy, those who promote and organize them will obey the law, and not until this is done, in my opinion, will monopoly be suppressed.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a recent case, Nash against The United States, reported in Two hundred and twenty-ninth United States Reports, has held that the construction placed on the Sherman law in the Standard Oil Co. case, does not, because of uncertainty, affect its validity as a criminal statute; but since the guilt or innocence of a defendant must depend upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the restraint or monopoly with which he is charged, it will always be difficult, under the doctrine of reasonable doubt, to obtain a conviction. I believe all lawyers who have tried criminal cases will agree with me that for this reason the construction given the statute greatly weakens it as a criminal law. In my opinion it makes the enactment of other and further penal statutes an imperative necessity.

Mr. President, I wish now to briefly call attention to the provisions of the bill we have under consideration, in support of my statement that sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of the bill as passed by the House are substantially the only ones containing any substantive law supplementing the Sherman antitrust law. I have already fully discussed those sections and will omit any reference to them here.

The bill as enacted by the House and reported to the Senate contains 23 sections.

Section 1 is devoted entirely to the definition of words and phrases used in the bill.

Section 3 prohibited the owners of mines, oil or gas wells, and plants for refining products of such mines and wells and for producing hydroelectric energy from refusing arbitrarily to sell the products of the same to any responsible party who may apply to purchase them for consumption or resale. This section is clearly vicious, and I believe an unconstitutional limitation of the liberty of contract, and was properly stricken out by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Section 5 is merely a reproduction of section 7 of the Sherman law, creating a civil action in favor of those injured by restraints of trade and monopolies.

Section 6 contains two paragraphs. The first provides that final decrees in suits brought in equity by the United States under the antitrust laws shall be prima facie evidence of the guilt of the defendant in civil actions brought by individuals against the same defendant for the same cause; and the second concerns the statute of limitations in such cases. These both affect the remedy and are good and wholesome provisions.

Section 7 is in these words:

> That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust law.

This section does not supplement the antitrust laws nor does it restrict them. It is really a reenactment of the present law concerning such organizations.

Mr. Justice Lamar in the case of Gompers v. The Buck Stove & Range Co. (221 U. S., 439), says:

> Society itself is an organization and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law, therefore recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that comes from such association. By virtue of this right powerful labor unions have been organized.

There are other cases wherein the legality of such organizations is sustained in stronger and more explicit terms. I refer to the cases of State v. Stockford (77 Conn., 227), Snow v. Wheeler (113 Mass., 179), Beck v. Railway Teamsters' Protective Union (118 Mich., 497), Gray v. Trades Council (91 Minn., 171), Mayer v. Stonecutters' Association (47 N. J. eq., 519), Jacobs v. Cohen (183 N. Y., 207), and Cote v. Murphy (159 Pa. St., 420).

But as some doubt has arisen concerning the legality of these organizations, the Gompers case not being considered decisive, as the statement there made is perhaps dictum, it is well that the question be definitely settled by legislation, and for that reason this section should be enacted into law.

Section 8, in addition to prohibiting interlocking directorates of competitive corporations, contains a provision regulating the dealings of persons with corporations of which they are officers or agents, and will remedy a common abuse of the rights of stockholders, but it has no relation to the antitrust law which we propose to supplement.

Section 10 concerns the venue or the place where suits to enforce the antitrust laws against corporations may be brought and liberalizes the Sherman law to some extent upon this subject.

Section 11 authorizes witnesses in suits brought by the United States under the antitrust laws to be summoned in any district where found.

Section 12 enacts that all directors, officers, or agents of corporations who shall aid, command, or procure violations of the antitrust laws by the corporation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and is merely a reenactment of the Sherman law, sections 1, 2, and 3. In other words, it has always been held that the officers of corporations violating the law were punishable under these sections, and several prosecutions have been conducted under them.

Section 13 authorizes suits to be brought by the United States in equity to restrain violations of this act in all things as authorized by section 4 of the Sherman law for violations of it.

Section 14 authorizes persons and corporations to bring suits in equity against those violating the antitrust laws in all things, as section 4 of the Sherman law authorizes the Government to do so. It provides a new remedy for persons and corporations against monopolies, and would be valuable but for the great expense and delay incident to this procedure.

The other nine sections of the bill contain nothing whatever relating to restraints of trade and monopolization of commerce, but concern granting injunctions by Federal courts and the punishment of contemnors. They are not germane to the legislation now under consideration and I will not now discuss them.

Mr. President, we have here a bill entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," but if sections 2 and 4 and the penal clauses of sections 8 and 9 are stricken out it will contain but two sections of substantive law supplementary of the Sherman law, and those two without, as I believe, an effective remedy to enforce them.

Will the people of this country accept this legislation as a fulfillment of the pledges of the great political parties, and of the declaration of Congress that it will remain in session until it enacts legislation supplementary of the Sherman law, that will effectually suppress and destroy the monopolies that have been preying upon the people for so many years? I ask this question of the Senators upon both sides of the Chamber. I want you to ask yourselves whether you believe a statute confined to making holding companies and interlocking directorates unlawful, without criminal penalties to enforce them, will meet the exigencies which call for further legislation to suppress monopoly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does not the Senator think it is a very close question whether those matters are not already prohibited by the Sherman law?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am coming to that direct question. It is answered by the court in the case of the United States against the Union Pacific Railroad Co. That was a case where one railroad company had purchased stock of a competing company sufficient to dominate and control it, and it was held that the transaction came within the prohibition of the Sherman law, and the combination thus formed enjoined and dissolved.

I read from the syllabus of that case:

> The Union Pacific and Southern Pacific are competing systems of interstate railways, and their consolidation by the control of the latter by the former, through a dominating stock interest, does, as a matter of fact, abridge free competition, and is an illegal restraint of interstate trade under the Sherman law.

Interlocking directorates have also been held in other cases to be the means of monopolization of commerce, and therefore unlawful when used for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The statement made by the Senator a few moments ago—that practically nothing at all is accomplished to meet the promises of legislation supplementary to the Sherman Antitrust Act—naturally challenges the attention of the Senate. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator.

The pending motion is to reconsider the vote by which sections 2 and 4 were stricken out. If that should be done and the sections as recommended by the committee should be adopted, would the Senator then feel that anything had been accomplished?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know that I follow the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Sections 2 and 4 have now been eliminated from the bill, leaving, as I understand the Senator, nothing in the way of a redemption of the promise of supplementary legislation except——

Mr. SHIELDS. No; the Senator mistakes me. I said sections 8 and 9 were valuable provisions.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). Except sections 8 and 9, which, as I understand the Senator says, are perhaps already covered by the Sherman Antitrust Act. If the motion to reconsider prevails, then sections 2 and 4 will be before the Senate with the recommendations of the committee. Will the Senator then favor the adoption of the substitutes or the amendments offered by the committee?

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator mean to inquire whether I would favor the retention in this bill of sections 2 and 4, as enacted by the House?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is what I want done.

Mr. WALSH. My question is, Would the Senator then be in favor of the recommendation of the committee that the penal provisions be stricken out and that enforcement be by the procedure described in section 9b?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the bill would be greatly improved by retaining sections 2 and 4 without the criminal provisions, but I believe it would be immensely improved by retaining the penal clauses.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator believes it would be a very decided advantage if they were restored with the provision of the bill in it now for the enforcement of those two sections?

Mr. SHIELDS. I certainly do. I am in favor of making it stronger in every possible way.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator knows, as a matter of course, that those of us who believe in the efficacy of section 5 of the trade commission bill will insist that everything that could be attained by this provision is already attained by section 5 of the trade commission bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do understand that.

Mr. WALSH. Then the Senator simply means that, in his judgment, nothing has been accomplished; but, in the judgment of the Senate, what he hopes to accomplish has been already accomplished by the trade commission bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have very little confidence in the efficacy of the trade commission, but as it is to become a law I hope the most sanguine anticipations of its friends may be realized.

Mr. WALSH. I recognize that. I recognize that the Senator was a very earnest antagonist of section 5 of the trade commission bill, and he expressed here upon the floor the view that it would be found inefficacious. We understand that the Senator takes that view; but I hope it will not be overlooked, in connection with the statement now made by the Senator, that little has been done to redeem the promises of the Democratic platform, that in the judgment of the Senate all that the Senator now hopes to accomplish by the restoration of sections 2 and 4, with the provisions of section 9b, has already been accomplished by the provisions of section 5 of the trade commission bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has misunderstood what I said. I was speaking of the present bill. I do not care to reargue the trade commission bill.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if the Senator will pardon just a word more, what the Senator really means is that if it shall transpire that section 5 of the trade commission bill is utterly void or inefficacious, then nothing will have been done to improve the situation.

Mr. SHIELDS. No. I have said that this bill does contain some good legislation, but not what present conditions demand to supplement the Sherman law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana is not quite accurate in his statement when he says that the Senate has determined that the trade commission bill does effect the remedies provided for in the Clayton bill.

Mr. WALSH. It is intended to cover the evils at which sections 2 and 4 are aimed.

Mr. REED. The Senate has never said any such thing, in my opinion. The Senate has never gone on record on that question, in my judgment. The Senate passed the trade commission bill for whatever purposes are embraced within that bill in the view and the opinion of the different men voting for it; but at the time that bill was passed, in the form in which it was passed, it was stated repeatedly upon the floor that it was to be followed by the Clayton bill, and that that bill had specific provisions in it; and instead of the Senate committing itself to the doctrine that the trade commission bill covered all of the evils and was the end of legislation, it was expressly understood that the bill was to be followed by the Clayton bill. So men might have voted for the trade commission bill in the best of faith, believing it to be a high remedial bill, and yet have fully intended to follow it with other legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I trust we shall not get into confusion about this matter. I trust the Senator does not desire to have the Senate understand him, nor to have the country understand him, as meaning that when the trade commission bill was passed those who favored it did not believe that they were making a provision to take care of local price cutting, denounced by section 2, and tying-in contracts, denounced by section 4 of this act.

Mr. REED. I mean to say just this: There were Senators, undoubtedly, who believed that the trade commission bill would take care of these practices. There were Senators, undoubtedly, who did not believe that it would take care of those practices. The Senate has never determined that the trade commission bill took care of any particular practice. It was construed here by a great many Senators, and there were as many constructions as there were constructionists. I am not charging that anyone in this body is not acting in the best of faith; but I challenge the statement, and I do it kindly and respectfully, that the trade commission bill was passed to take care of the propositions embraced in sections 2 and 4. In the opinion of some Senators it will take care of them, but the Senate has never committed itself to that doctrine, and if it has—if the Senate has committed itself to the doctrine that the trade commission bill takes care of all the evils there—why are we discussing this bill? Why not strike out all of these sections and leave it simply on the question of injunction, which is another and different subject?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is a perfect answer to that. Nobody has ever contended that section 5 of the trade commission bill reaches the evils denounced by sections 8 and 9. They do not refer to competition at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the Senator will yield for just a moment, I should like to get an understanding of his view. I understand that the Senator favors sections 2 and 4 as originally passed by the House?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to have the Senator state whether, in his judgment, as a legal proposition, if those sections are retained, will that tend to limit the power of the trade commission under section 5?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think so. I can not see how it can have that effect. If there is any doubt upon the subject, there can be inserted in this bill a saving provision. I do not wish it to have that effect. I wish the trade commission to be as effective as possible.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator thinks it desirable to have a clause, though, expressly saving that effect?

Mr. SHIELDS. A saving clause might be advisable as a matter of prudence, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator believe that section 5 of the trade commission bill, which denounces unfair competition, covers the two practices denounced in sections 2 and 4 of this bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not. That is my judgment as a lawyer, and I so said when we discussed that section.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator at the time to claim that it did not cover anything; that section 5 of the trade commission bill has no significance at all; that it does not cover any practices.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Montana certainly understood me correctly. I do not think it will cover any of the practices prohibited by the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. WALSH. I simply did not intend that any misapprehension should be gathered from the answer made to the question addressed to the Senator from Tennessee by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think there was any danger of misapprehension. I hope the Senator understands me.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator, then, does not believe that tying contracts, or exclusive contracts and discriminations in prices, denounced by these two sections of the bill, amount to unfair competition? I mean sections 2 and 4.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think they go further. I think they are restraints of trade and means of monopolization of commerce.

Mr. CULBERSON. They are unfair competition.

Mr. SHIELDS. The trouble with the Senator is he forgets the argument made by a number of Senators, including myself, that the language of section 5 confines the operations of the commission to trades-mark cases.

I should like to see these sections placed in that bill if they are to be left out of this, for the practices denounced are most pernicious and oppressive and ought to be condemned and prohibited in terms the meaning of which there can be no doubt.

Mr. President, I think I have shown that penal legislation of the character contained in sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of the House bill is favored and approved by the great majority of the people of this country, and that it is necessary to supplement and facilitate the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law.

The common sense and advantages of such legislation, it seems to me, must be obvious to every lawyer who is familiar with the schemes of monopolists and the litigation of the United States instituted to restrain and punish them. Specific offenses of this kind can be defined with precision, and the facts be discovered and proven with more certainty, and less expense and delay, than can be done in cases of completed conspiracies and monopolies covered and concealed by ingenious devices and complicated details. Penalize these badges of monopoly and they will not grow, fructify, and ripen into full-grown monopolies.

I believe the penalties provided in the sections we are discussing for constituent elements of monopoly are sufficient for those offenses, but I also believe that the Sherman law ought to be amended so as to make those who promote, organize, and carry on monopolies, guilty of felony, punishable by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years nor less than 1 year, and fine not exceeding $25,000 nor less than $1,000, or both, in the discretion of the court. If we place such penal laws as these upon the statute books and the Department of Justice will vigorously enforce them, it can restrain and suppress monopolies of trade and commerce, a thing it has wholly failed to do under present laws and the procedure that has been followed for their enforcement.

Mr. President, I am unable to see any good reason why the Senate should fail to agree with the House in these matters. The causes which led to the enactment of the Sherman law exist to-day. The causes for supplementing that law, when the people in their political platforms declared for penal legislation for that purpose, and when the President advised Congress to enact it, exist to-day. There has been no change in conditions, and, so far as I am informed, none in public opinion of the necessity of this legislation. I was informed to-day by a Senator in the Chamber that the Standard Oil Co. is now engaged, in the Middle Western States, in price cutting, a scheme which it has long pursued to destroy competitors and monopolize commerce of communities and States. And we all know that monopolists have not hesitated, while the whole world is suffering from the effects of the most destructive and distressing war in the annals of history, to lay their rapacious hands upon foodstuffs and the common necessities of life for speculative purposes. We should not fear to disturb this sort of business.

We all condemn private monopoly, and I believe every Senator in this Chamber earnestly desires to enact a law that will supplement the Sherman law and facilitate its enforcement. Our only differences are those concerning the best means of doing this. I accord to everyone the right to his views upon this question, and claiming the same right for myself I have here expressed the views I entertain concerning this legislation.

Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to consume time in dwelling on the evils of private monopolies. We all agree that they are, in any and all forms, incompatible with the rights, liberties, and institutions of a free people, and inevitably result in oppression, distress, and poverty of the masses. But I will ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read what Senator George, of Mississippi, said of monopolies when the Sherman antitrust bill was being discussed:

"These trusts and combinations are great wrongs to the people. They have invaded many of the most important branches of business. They operate with a double-edged sword. They increase beyond reason the cost of the necessaries of life and business and they decrease the cost of the raw material, the farm products of the country. They regulate prices at their will, depress the price of what they buy, and increase the price of what they sell. They aggregate to themselves great enormous wealth by extortion, which makes the people poor. Then making this extorted wealth the means of further extortion from their unfortunate victims, the people of the United States, they pursue unmolested, unrestrained by law, their ceaseless round of peculation under the law, till they are fast producing that condition of our people in which the great mass of them are servitors of those who have this aggregated wealth at their command."

Senator Edmunds also said:

"The expansion of business of every sort and the dangerous combinations that have attempted—in many instances too successfully—to absorb the business of the country into their own hands, to crush out fair and useful competition, and to dominate and monopolize the industries and trade of the Republic have been so great that the result is the unnatural and unequal distribution of wealth and power which the experience of centuries has shown to be among the great evils that affect civilization and true progress."

Mr. President, all persons and all political parties agree "that private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," and that penal punishment of those promoting, organizing, and operating them is necessary to suppress and prevent them, and I believe Congress should not longer hesitate to enact laws providing for certain and prompt punishment of that character. The necessity for it exists, and the time for it has come.

During the delivery of Mr. SHIELDS's speech,

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri for that purpose?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fletcher	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard
Borah	Gallinger	Lee, Md.	Shields
Brady	Gore	Lewis	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Gronna	McCumber	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hollis	Martin, Va.	Sterling
Chilton	Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Swanson
Clapp	James	Overman	Thomas
Culberson	Johnson	Perkins	Thompson
Cummins	Jones	Pittman	Thornton
Dillingham	Kenyon	Reed	Walsh
Fall	Lane	Shafroth	White

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I address the Chair to record for the RECORD that Senator SMITH, of Georgia; Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana; and Senator VARDAMAN, of Mississippi, have been invited by the Secretary of the Treasury to participate in a conference touching the cotton States, and are present with the Secretary of the Treasury, which accounts for their absence at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. ASHURST and Mr. POINDEXTER answered to their names when called.

Mr. KERN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. SHIVELY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. SHIELDS's speech,

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, the objects of the trust bills under consideration, briefly stated, are to prohibit and make unlawful certain unfair practices which ordinarily, when considered separately, might not constitute a violation of existing laws; to strengthen the Sherman antitrust law; to prevent the formation of trusts and monopolies by disarming their promoters in the outset; and to prohibit overcapitalization of corporations. Among the particular practices made unlawful are unfair and oppressive competition exercised for the purpose of injuring or destroying the business of competitors, holding companies, interlocking directorates, and the overissue of securities by common carriers. The officers and directors of corporations are made personally liable for the unlawful acts of the corporation on the theory that they after all are the real perpetrators of the offenses against the law and consequently should suffer directly the penalty of the law. Another important feature of the legislation is the exemption of labor and farmer organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws in order to avoid the embarrassment occasioned by some of the decisions of the courts on this question, which I discussed a few days ago.

The trust question is one of the most difficult problems ever presented to Congress for solution. The trust is the greatest menace to individual effort ever conceived by man. The idea was created by men whose wealth had already reached proportions beyond the dreams of avarice, but whose greed was unsatisfied unless they practically controlled all of the production of the country and every business enterprise engaged in by their fellow men. The trust wave swept over the country like a terrible cyclone, causing greater loss and destruction of property accumulated by individual effort than all of the storms and cyclones that have occurred since the flood. Men who had devoted a lifetime to a particular trade or business found themselves bankrupt in a single night and, what was really worse, left in an entirely helpless condition, where further individual effort along their chosen line of employment brought no returns. The greatest period of trust formation and activity occupied the decade between the years 1898 and 1908. The business men of the country during this period seemed to be corporation mad. The principal business of lawyers was to organize corporations, and as soon as organized to throw as many corporations into one concern as could be induced to enter a combination in order to create the greatest monopoly possible in the particular business engaged in or attempted to be controlled.

During this time I was living in the oil and gas section of my State and witnessed that great development in southeastern Kansas. Almost every person owning as much as 40 acres of land formed a corporation with a capital stock of about $1,000,000 and began at once to sell $1 shares of stock in his company at about 10 cents per share. If he finally got money enough together to drill a well and happened to strike oil or gas, his stock immediately went up to par, and a $2,500 oil or gas well raised in value in the owner's mind to a million dollars. The result was that nearly every individual operator failed and the Standard Oil Co., as usual in such cases, came along and purchased all of the wrecked properties for a mere song, reaping the benefits of all the individual labor and money spent in prospecting and obtained and still retain almost complete control of the field. Thousands of corporations were formed everywhere over the United States at the rate of about 20,000 each year. The growth was so rapid that, according to the number of returns made to the Internal Revenue Commissioner in 1909, the number reached the enormous figure of 262,490 and gradually increased since that time until in 1912, when 305,336 corporations rendered returns for that year representing a capital stock of $61,738,227,730.54 and bonded and other indebtedness of $34,749,516,353.63 and an aggregate net income of $3,832,150,410.92. The increase in capital stock in 1912 over 1911 is shown to have been $1,671,088,805.12, while the amount of bonded and other indebtedness shows an increase of $2,585,978,392.23. The net income reported shows an increase in that single year of $618,443,163.10. (See 1913 Annual Report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, p. 12.) About 8,000 of the 305,336 corporations have a capital stock of $1,000,000 or more and about 600 combinations of corporations, or what are commonly called "trusts," were organized from these corporations. As corporations are combinations of individuals, trusts are generally combinations of corporations, so that many industries may be carried on under one general management.

I have spent considerable time and labor trying to ascertain with some degree of accuracy the number of trusts and large combinations of corporations organized to date, and I am able to furnish a list of most of them, which I have endeavored to make as complete as possible. Of course in the preparation of any list of trusts much must necessarily depend upon the definition or understanding of the term "trust." Several different definitions have been employed by various writers on this subject:

(a) Definitions based on size alone; for example, all concerns having a capital of more than $1,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 are sometimes regarded as trusts.

(b) Definitions based on degree of control of industries; for example, it has been held that a concern is a trust if it controls half the products of an industry, or by others if it controls 60 per cent or 40 per cent or 30 per cent.

(c) The presence to a substantial degree of this control has been held by many writers to be the determining factor justifying the term "trust." According to this idea, any concern is a trust which, by virtue of its control of raw materials or its production of a large portion of the output in a given industry, or by other means, is able to control prices.

The best definition I have been able to find, however, and specially applicable to the subject under consideration, is given by Mr. Bryan W. Holt on page 288 of the World Almanac for 1913, following a list of 294 principal trusts of the United States given by him as corrected to November, 1912. The definition is as follows:

> Trust, as properly understood, means a consolidation, combine, pool, or agreement of two or more natural competing concerns which establishes a limited monopoly, local, national, or international, with power to fix prices or rates in any industry or group of industries.

Mr. John Moody, in his exhaustive work on The Truth About the Trusts, published in 1904, gives a list of trusts created up to that time, numbering 445, with a total floating capital of $20,379,162,511, and showing 8,664 independent plants acquired or controlled. He divides these trusts into six different classes, as follows:

	Number of plants acquired or controlled.	Total capitalization (stocks and bonds outstanding).
7 greater industrial trusts	1,528	$2,662,752,100
298 lesser industrial trusts	3,426	4,055,039,433
13 industrial trusts in process of reorganization or readjustment	334	528,551,000
Total of all industrial trusts	5,288	7,246,342,533
111 franchise trusts	1,336	3,735,456,071
6 great steam railroad groups	700	9,017,086,907
10 "allied independent" steam railroad systems	250	380,277,000
Total of all franchise and transportation trusts	2,376	13,132,819,978
Grand total of all trusts, industrial, franchise, transportation, etc.	8,664	20,379,162,511

The seven greater industrial trusts embrace the Amalgamated Copper Co., American Smelting & Refining Co., American Sugar Refining Co., Consolidated Tobacco Co., International Mercantile Marine Co., Standard Oil Co., and United States Steel Corporation, which I have enumerated separately in the list I have prepared.

The six great steam-railroad groups and the 10 "allied independent" steam-railroad systems acquiring or controlling 1,040 independent railroads, with a total capitalization of $9,397,363,907, I have itemized separately under the head of "Railroad systems."

Mr. Moody also shows the shrinkage in 100 of the industries, copied from the Wall Street Journal of October 26, 1903 (pp. 479–482 of his work). The shrinkage in value of stocks in these 100 concerns alone is shown to be $1,753,959,793, an amount more than sufficient to pay the entire national debt of the United States.

As I have stated, the seven greater industrial trusts in 1904 were represented by the aggregate of outstanding stocks and bonds reaching the enormous total of $2,662,752,100. Of this amount over one-half, or about $1,370,000,000, is included in the capitalization of the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiary corporations. These greater industries have all been organized since 1898 with one exception—the Sugar Trust—and all are incorporated under the New Jersey laws. These seven great combinations alone represent an aggregate consolidation of over 1,500 different plants or business concerns.

The list which I have been able to prepare, after much thorough research, gives 628 trusts, with a total capitalization of $24,775,723,599, embracing in all 9,877 original companies. Therefore showing a wiping out by the trusts to this date of about 10,000 independent business concerns.

I here present the list and ask that it be made a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The list referred to is as follows:

[1] About.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, an analysis of the foregoing figures shows that of these trusts 7 have a capitalization of over $1,000,000,000, 22 of $100,000,000 and over and less than $1,000,000,000, 54 of $50,000,000 and over and less than $100,000,000, 59 of $25,000,000 and over and less than $50,000,000, 76 of $15,000,000 and over and less than $25,000,000, 79 of $10,000,000 and over and less than $15,000,000, 150 of $5,000,000 and over and less than $10,000,000, and 175 of $1,000,000 and over and less than $5,000,000.

Of the six great railroad groups, all exceed $1,000,000,000 capitalization, and the Morgan group exceeds $2,200,000,000.

It is interesting to note that the Rockefeller and Morgan interests absolutely control the seven greater enormous companies. The Rockefellers were the fathers of the trust idea in this country, and have always been the controlling figures in most of the great trust enterprises. The greater trusts are dominated by that group of men known as the "Standard Oil" or "Rockefeller financiers," while the Morgans, Vanderbilts, Harrimans, Ryans, Guggenheims, and the Goulds have the greatest interests in some of the other trusts, yet the influence of the Rockefeller interests is more or less felt by all of the big combinations.

A glance at the different members of the Standard Oil officials will show that they are identified in a great many of the prominent trusts, and it is a well-known fact that their indirect influence is of great importance in most of the other industrial consolidations.

It has been frequently said that monopoly is here to stay. I do not agree with this doctrine. I believe monopoly can be destroyed by proper legislation, and, above all else, such gigantic corporations with a monopoly upon practically everything we produce, everything we eat and wear, and everything we use in the construction of the homes in which we live can be hereafter absolutely prevented. Indeed, progress has already been made in the right direction. Many of the trusts have already confessed their wrongs and now beg for an opportunity to be good. I believe that trusts would never have existed in their present iniquitous form if the laws already on the statute books had been vigorously enforced in the beginning. If the Rockefellers and their associates, who deliberately planned the first big trusts in this country, had been vigorously prosecuted under the criminal statutes, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary, the problem would have been practically solved. But those in power were either too friendly with or too much afraid of the men of wealth to enforce the criminal statutes against them. There was even great hesitation in proceeding under the civil provisions of the law. The courts were also slow in getting results, as is usual in such matters. While trying one case a dozen others sprang up like mushrooms from perhaps the same source.

In contemplating the delay in court procedure I am reminded of the trial of the famous Hillman Insurance case in Kansas, wherein the principal issue of fact was simply to determine whether or not Hillman was dead. After half a dozen trials, consuming in all about 20 years' time, both sides gave up in disgust and settled the controversy, but the single question as to whether Hillman was dead or alive was just as doubtful at the end of the litigation as when the trial began, 20 years before.

While my life work has been in the court room and I am naturally prejudiced in favor of the courts and will yield to no man a greater confidence in or respect of the courts, yet I am compelled to admit that they have shown themselves totally inadequate to handle the trust question. We have therefore been compelled to provide some additional remedy. Suits are not generally brought under the Sherman Act except in cases of great magnitude and for clear violations of the law. The present act is designed to begin action as soon as the trust begins to form, and thereby prevent its creation. It will also give a better chance to the poor man before the law. It will be a great benefit to him to have the Government prosecute these suits at public expense and to have the advantage of the judgment rendered in case he desires to proceed against the same trust. I favor vesting power and authority over these combinations in a Federal trade commission, such as we recently created, with only restricted and limited review by the courts. The courts, in reviewing the commission's orders, will have the benefit of the findings of the commission after thorough investigation such as no court has the facilities to make. We have reached the point in our industrial history when we are compelled to decide between a commission created for the special purpose of handling this particular subject and the courts, which are already overladen with other great duties and are wholly unable to give the time and attention that such questions require. So after some reluctance I have been convinced that the best way to handle the subject for the present at least is by a Federal commission created for this special purpose and charged with the particular duty of destroying unlawful combinations already created and preventing the creation of new organizations. I am in favor of giving that commission sufficient power to proceed with the greatest expedition and certainty to accomplish the proposed object which that law already passed (H. R. 15613), this bill (H. R. 15657), and the securities bill (H. R. 16586), soon to be placed before the Senate, will enable us to accomplish. That there is great need for this legislation is emphasized by the fact that it was made the subject of a special message by the President. Among other things, the President said:

> What we are purposing to do, therefore, is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and Government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land. The Government and business men are ready to meet each other half way in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law. The best informed men of the business world condemn the methods and processes and consequences of monopoly as we condemn them; and the instinctive judgment of the vast majority of business men everywhere goes with them We shall now be their spokesmen. That is the strength of our position and the sure prophecy of what will ensue when our reasonable work is done.
> We are all agreed that "private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," and our program is founded upon that conviction. It will be a comprehensive but not a radical or unacceptable program, and these are its items, the changes which opinion deliberately sanctions and for which business waits.
> It waits with acquiescence, in the first place, for laws which will effectually prohibit and prevent such interlockings of the personnel of the directorates of great corporations—banks and railroads, industrial, commercial, and public service bodies—as in effect result in making those who borrow and those who lend practically one and the same, those who sell and those who buy, but the same persons trading with one another under different names and in different combinations, and those who effect to compete in fact partners and masters of some whole field of business. Sufficient time should be allowed, of course, in which to effect these changes of organization without inconvenience or confusion.
> Such a prohibition will work much more than a mere negative good by correcting the serious evils which have arisen, because, for example, the men who have been the directing spirits of the great investment banks have usurped the place which belongs to independent industrial management working in its own behoof. It will bring new men, new energies, a new spirit of initiative, new blood, into the management of our great business enterprises. It will open the field of industrial development and origination to scores of men who have been obliged to serve when their abilities entitled them to direct. It will immensely hearten the young men coming on and will greatly enrich the business activities of the whole country.

As has already been shown, the growth of these concerns has been swift and most alarming and has been destructive of individual effort in almost every business enterprise that men have attempted to engage in. Neither at birth, in life, nor at death are we free from trusts. We are welcomed into the world by the Milk Trust and rocked in a cradle built by the Furniture Trust. As we proceed through life we find practically everything we eat and everything we wear furnished by a trust and nearly every business in which we may wish to engage completely monopolized; and at last, as we approach death, we are brought face to face with the Coffin Trust, by which we are finally conveyed to our last resting place.

All of the political parties have repeatedly declared themselves favorable to immediate legislation on this subject; but the Republican Party, which has been in power, has done nothing in the way of legislation since 1890 to attempt to arrest the progress of monopoly. This is the first time the Democrats have been in power since the great combinations have taken hold of the country, and we are now at our first opportunity making the first determined effort which has been made to remedy the existing deplorable business conditions.

Mr. Roosevelt made great pretensions of being a "great trust buster," but judging from the wonderful activity in trust formation during his administration and the special encouragement the trusts received from him, and particularly the United States Steel Corporation, the most gigantic and monopolistic of them all, he would be more appropriately named "the great trust breeder." There were more trusts formed under the Roosevelt administration than under any other administration in the history of the country. His policy seemed more to encourage than to arrest their creation. It will be observed from an examination of the foregoing list of trusts that 299 out of the 628 were formed under the Roosevelt administration—practically one-half of all the trusts created from the beginning to the present time. It is also interesting to note that fewer trusts have organized in the year and a half of the Wilson administration than in the same length of time during the entire period of trust formation. I have been able to find only 12 great combinations created since March, 1913, and some of these are reorganizations of old companies, and some, while organized in this country, are engaged in business only in a foreign land. Only one trust has thus far been formed in 1914. I present the list and ask that it be made a part of my remarks.

Trusts organized in the United States since Mar. 4, 1913.

So you can count on your fingers all of the trusts which have been created and doing business in this country since the Wilson administration began, and absolutely none of these industries affect in any way the necessaries of life. The truth is that those engaged in this kind of enterprise fully realize and understand that President Wilson means business, and that this administration purposes at least to do something toward destroying and arresting the terrible progress of monopoly, which gained such headway under Republican administrations and brought so much calamity to the business world.

One of the greatest evils of the trust, aside from the destruction of competition, lies in overcapitalization by the trust promoters and the necessity then imposed upon the managers of the combination to put extortionate prices upon their products in order to pay dividends on the watered stock. The chief purpose of antitrust legislation is for the protection of the public, to protect it from extortion practiced by the trust, but at the same time not to take away from it any advantages of cheapness or better service which honest, intelligent cooperation may bring. Our idea is to remove certain restrictions which give an undue advantage to big business. No one will dispute the fact that big business has for years used its power to secure undue advantages for itself which produced monopoly and destroyed competition. Small business has had to fight for a living, while big business has had its own way. This condition of affairs, which has existed for the last 16 years, has had its day. It is high time now for a complete change. Big business realizes it as much as those who oppose it. Everybody will finally come to the conclusion that only honest and fair business methods shall be tolerated in this country and that "private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable." The trusts are already asking this administration, "What can we do to be saved?" By voluntarily dissolving they are accepting our policy. "The public be pleased," instead of following their former policy of "The public be damned." Heretofore the trusts have evidently asked the Republican administrations, "What can we do to evade the law?" Now they are asking the Democratic administration, "What must we do to obey the law?" The trinity trust laws passed by this Congress will answer the question. In the language of the President:

> We are now about to write the additional articles of our Constitution of peace, the peace that is honor and freedom and prosperity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to reconsider the votes by which section 2 and section 4 were stricken from the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Camden	Fletcher	James
Bankhead	Chilton	Gallinger	Johnson
Borah	Clapp	Gore	Jones
Brady	Culberson	Gronna	Kenyon
Bristow	Cummins	Hollis	Kern
Bryan	Fall	Hughes	Lane
Lewis	Owen	Shively	Vardaman
McLean	Perkins	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Martin, Va.	Ransdell	Smith, Md.	White
Martine, N. J.	Reed	Sterling	Williams
Myers	Shafroth	Thomas
Nelson	Sheppard	Thompson
Overman	Shields	Thornton

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My colleague [Mr. SWANSON] has been called from the city by sickness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw my motion to reconsider in so far as it pertains to section 2. I insist on it, however, as to section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn so far as it pertains to section 2.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the committee have no objection to the motion to reconsider the vote whereby section 4 was stricken from the bill and that the motion may be adopted. The committee are expecting to report an amendment to the bill looking to curing the defect as to patented articles, and will do so probably to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to reconsider the vote by which section 4 was stricken from the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment, proposed by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is, on page 17, line 14, after the word "corporation" and the comma, to insert "arising or accruing from such commerce in whole or in part."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to inquire as to the page and line.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 14, after the word "corporation" and the comma, it is proposed to insert "arising or accruing from such commerce in whole or in part."

Mr. REED. What line is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Line 14, page 17, after the word "corporation."

Mr. GALLINGER. So that it will read how?

The SECRETARY. So that it will read:

> Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation, arising or accruing from such commerce in whole or in part, or willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $500 or confined in the penitentiary not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 17, after line 21, to insert:

> SEC. 9b. That authority to enforce compliance with the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act by the corporations, associations, partnerships, and individuals respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: In the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers and in the Federal trade commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows:
> Whenever the commission vested with jurisdiction thereof has reason to believe, either upon information furnished by its agents or employees or upon complaint, duly verified by affidavit, of any interested person, that any corporation, association, partnership, or individual is violating any of the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act, it shall issue and cause to be served a notice, accompanied with a written statement of the violation charged, upon such corporation, association, partnership, or individual who shall thereupon be called upon, within a reasonable time fixed in such notice, not to exceed 30 days thereafter, to appear and show cause why an order should not issue to restrain and prohibit the violation charged. If upon a hearing held pursuant to such notice it shall appear to the commission that any of the provisions of said sections have been or are being violated, then it shall issue and cause to be served an order commanding such corporation, association, partnership, or individual forthwith to cease and desist from such violation, and to transfer or dispose of the stock or resign from the directorships held contrary to the provisions of section 8 or 9, as the case may be, within the time and in the manner prescribed in said order. Any such order may be modified or set aside at any time by the commission issuing it for good cause shown.
> If any corporation, association, partnership, or individual charged with obedience thereto fails and neglects to obey any such order of a commission, the said commission, by its attorneys, if any it has, or by the appropriate district attorney acting under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, may apply for an enforcement of such order to the district court of the United States for the district wherein such corporation, association, partnership, or individual is an inhabitant or may be found or transacts any business, and therewith transmit to the said court the original record in the proceeding, including all the testimony taken therein and the report and order of the commission. Upon the filing of the record, the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the questions determined therein and shall have power to make and to enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings such orders and decrees as may be just and equitable.

On motion of the commission, and on such notice as the court shall deem reasonable, the court shall set down the cause for summary final hearing. Upon such final hearing the finding of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, but if either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may allow such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or before a master appointed by the court and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem just.

Disobedience to any order or decree which may be made in any such proceeding or any injunction or other process issued therein shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 a day during the continuance of such disobedience or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any party to any proceeding brought under the provisions of this section before either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Trade Commission, including the person upon whose complaint such proceeding shall have been begun, as well as the United States by and through the Attorney General thereof, may appeal from any final order made by either of such commissions to any court having jurisdiction to enforce any order which might have been made upon application of such commission as hereinbefore provided, at any time within 90 days from the date of the entry of the order appealed from, by serving notice upon the adverse party and filing the same with the said commission; and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had as prescribed herein in the case of an application by the same commission for the enforcement of its order as hereinbefore provided.

Any final order or decree made by any district court in any proceeding brought under this section may be reviewed by the Supreme Court upon appeal, as in cases in equity, taken within 90 days from the entry of such order or decree.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in view of the adoption of section 5 of the trade-commission bill, the committee desire to offer an amendment to this amendment. It will be presented by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on page 18, line 16, after the word "charged," it is proposed to strike out all the rest of section 9b and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And thereupon such proceedings shall be had as are provided for in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes" on the institution of proceedings against any person, partnership, or corporation charged with unfair competition; and all the provisions of the said act relating to the hearing before the commission therein referred to, and to the order thereof, and to the proceedings for the enforcement of such order, or to suits to annul, suspend, or set aside the same, are hereby made applicable to proceedings instituted and orders made under this section. If the act complained of as a violation of any provision of sections 8 or 9 of this act has been accomplished, the commission having jurisdiction as herein provided is hereby empowered to make such order as may be appropriate to divest or require the corporation proceeded against to divest itself of any stock it may have acquired contrary to this act, or to rid or require such corporation to rid itself of a director ineligible under this act, or to compel it otherwise to conform to the requirements thereof.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to inquire when the committee met and agreed to recommend that amendment. I never heard it until this moment, and I never heard of it until this moment. I think I was—in fact, I know I was—at the last meeting of the committee at which this bill was considered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Missouri, I will state that this amendment was proposed by the committee on a poll. The Senator from Montana actually prepared the amendment, and the committee were polled upon it by him. Any further details of the polling can be given by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator has practically given the facts. The Senator from Missouri recognizes the fact that when these matters come before the Senate for consideration we can not run out and have a meeting of the committee on every one of the matters. It is the commonest thing in the world, when it is proposed that an amendment shall be made to a committee amendment, for the chairman or some other member to go around and poll the committee. The chairman of the committee asked me to poll the committee upon this amendment, and I saw everybody who was here and reported it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been pretty constant in my attendance upon the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. President, so far as I am myself concerned, I should not like to have anybody bound by that at all.

Mr. REED. That is all I desire. I want this to come in as an individual amendment, and not as a committee amendment; and I want it debated upon the basis that it is an individual amendment, and not a committee amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. This is intended as a committee amendment, and it was presented in the same manner that the amendment was presented, striking out sections 2 and 4, by polling the committee. I hope it will be regarded as an amendment of the committee, because it is intended to harmonize this bill with the trade commission bill, and I think it does that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Missouri is going to engage in a discussion of this amendment I do not desire to interrupt, but before we vote upon this amendment I should like to have the Senator from Montana or the chairman of the committee state its effect, in what respect it harmonizes, and so forth. The Senator from Montana brought this amendment to me on the floor, but I have not yet had an opportunity to see the effect of it upon this bill, and in what respect it harmonizes. What I have been afraid of all the time is that out of harmony may come an emasculation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have not been polled on this amendment and know nothing about it. I have never been asked, as a member of the committee, whether I approved of it or not, and I do not think it is right to call it a committee amendment under those circumstances. It is nothing more than an individual amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I suppose that is a matter of very little consequence if the amendment has some merit in it.

Mr. BORAH. I was not complaining of the manner of the presentation. I simply wanted a discussion long enough to understand the precise effect of it.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment was presented by me in the open Senate. I called the attention of the Senate to the matter at the time. I indicated in a brief way what its character was, and I dare say a good many of the Senators present will recall the incident. It was presented on the 20th, five days ago, and was printed, and has been printed since that time; but that is a matter of no consequence, either.

The amendment brings, or attempts to bring, the procedure prescribed by section 9b of this bill into harmony with the procedure prescribed by section 5 of the trade commission bill. It will be recalled that in the discussion of that section it was pointed out that there was an essential difference between the method of procedure prescribed by that bill and that prescribed by the Clayton bill, the trade commission bill providing in substance that the order of the commission should be final except so far as it could be reviewed by proceedings brought to annul or set aside the order or any proceedings which might be brought to enforce the order; that it would have the same force and efficacy as an order made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in an ordinary case coming before that body, while the Clayton bill, as reported, provided for a complete review in the courts of the order which should be made either by the trade commission or by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In other words, to use terser expressions, the trade commission bill provided for the narrow review, the Clayton bill provided for the broad review of the order.

It is well known likewise that I advocated the substitution of the procedure prescribed by this bill for the procedure prescribed by the trade commission bill. I argued as well as I could in favor of the principle embodied in this measure, and asked that it be given recognition in the trade commission bill, but I was defeated in that effort. The Senate expressed its views. The Senate having once decided upon the matter, I do not care to go over the ground again and argue the same matters the second time. Thus I have endeavored to harmonize the provisions, and this provision eliminates the review provisions as provided by it and provides that all of the proceedings under sections 8 and 9 shall be exactly as provided under section 5 of the trade commission bill.

Mr. REED. The only reason I had for making the inquiry with reference to the consideration of this amendment before the committee was this: I find the custom of the Senate in the hot weather we have had is largely to absent itself and to remain away during discussion, and then for the Members to drift in from the cloakroom or from their offices when the vote is being taken, and inquire what the committee has recommended, and follow the lead of the committee. I have more than once witnessed the determination of questions simply by that process.

I agree that this proposition ought to be considered solely upon its merits. Every proposition should be so considered.

But the truth is, in most instances, we do not consider bills upon their merits; we accept the judgment of the committee.

This amendment was never considered by the committee in the sense that it was before the committee for discussion and action. The purpose of a committee is to assemble for common counsel, to discuss questions, and, after consideration, to vote upon them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. REED. In a moment. I agree now that there may arise during the progress of a bill instances where it is found necessary to make some minor change. In such a contingency the opinion of the committee may be ascertained by a poll. But this amendment is not a trivial matter; it is important. All I am asking is that it shall be considered upon its merits and not as a committee amendment.

I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will recollect that we had before us the question of a broad review and a narrow review; that it was considered for a week; and that the Cummins amendment was afterwards adopted. We contended for the broader review. The Cummins amendment having been adopted, there was no use to call the committee together to consider that question.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that the committee thought there was no use in calling the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is, the majority of the committee.

Mr. REED. It is singular that at least three of us did not hear of it. However, I care nothing about that. All I want is to have this proposition considered upon its merits. That is all I ask; and now that the attention of the Senate has been called to the exact facts, I am content.

However, I want to ask the Senate to gravely consider just what we are doing by section 9b of the bill. If after consideration it is the opinion of the Senate that we ought to take the course specified in section 9b, well and good. I shall have at least done my duty. The responsibility will be upon those who adopt the section.

The bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives contained sections 2 and 4 and 8 and 9. Each of those sections declared certain practices therein specified to be illegal. Each of those sections provided a method of enforcement by the courts of the land. Section 4 provided in express terms that anyone guilty of the offense denounced therein should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction should be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Section 2 as it came to us from the House denounced certain other practices as unlawful, and provided that the violator of that section should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

Sections 8 and 9 each denounced certain acts as unlawful and provided penalties identical with those specified in sections 2 and 4.

Now, I want if I can to get the attention of Senators for just a minute. These four sections of the bill as it came to us from the House denounced the four particular practices of monopoly which have been declared by the courts to be among the chief means monopoly has used to oppress. These four sections by express language declare the practices referred to to be illegal and affix criminal penalties. All of the sections may be enforced in the criminal courts, and may also be enforced in civil tribunals. These four sections were in accordance with the pledge of the Democratic platform and of the Republican platform, which were to the effect that we proposed to enforce the criminal penalties against those who were guilty of conspiracies in restraint of trade.

These four sections were supplemental to the Sherman Act and were of the exact character described by President Wilson in his message, which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] read this afternoon.

Now, we have stricken from every one of the sections, first, every criminal penalty——

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator is not now addressing himself at all to the amendment, but he wants to eliminate section 9b altogether and restore the penalty provided in sections 2, 4, 8, and 9.

Mr. REED. In a way the Senator has stated my position.

Mr. WALSH. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator, as the other matter is up. The question, I understand, that is before the Senate is whether the method of review prescribed by the Clayton bill shall be pursued or whether the method prescribed by the trade commission bill shall be pursued; that is to say, if the section shall stay in at all. Now, could the Senator express what his preference is as between those two?

Mr. REED. I would prefer to finish my statement of the question. I shall try to make it plain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator explain the four practices referred to?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will bear with me a moment, I desire first to finish the statement I am making. We have now stricken out every criminal penalty. The bill came here from the committee with them out. I protested in the committee against taking them out.

Now, it is proposed that we shall provide a special tribunal for their enforcement. The only method for enforcement is as follows: A party injured may appear before the trade commission, or the trade commission, on its own motion, may begin an inquiry to ascertain whether the practices prohibited by the bill are being followed by an individual or corporation. All the trade commission can do is to issue its order that the practice shall be stopped, and if the offender does not obey the trade-commission order, then the trade commission can bring suit in a Federal court to compel him to obey. If he is beaten there, he can appeal to the United States Court of Appeals. If he is beaten there, he can again appeal, this time to the Supreme Court of the United States. If he is finally beaten, he can pocket all the profits he has made in the intervening years. He does not suffer the loss of one penny, save possibly the court costs. He keeps the profits. He suffers no losses. He does not go to jail. He makes money by the transaction. The longer he can keep the case in court the better off he is. That is the proposition now before the Senate. I want Senators to know what is in the bill as it stands here now.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to section 12 of the bill. Will the Secretary read it as proposed to be amended? In addition to the enforcement of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 by the trade commission, the crime for which the corporation is guilty is made the crime of every director, officer, or agent also.

Mr. REED. I shall take pleasure in reading it in full and commenting upon it.

That every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal—

Observe the language, "of the penal"— provisions of the antitrust laws, who shall have aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, or procured such violation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof of any such director, officer, or agent he shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one years, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

That applies only to the officer of a corporation when the corporation has violated the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, and there is not a penal provision left in this bill. The sole province therefore of section 12 is to make those officers of corporations which have violated the penal provisions of the antitrust act as they now stand, disassociated from this bill liable in case the corporation has committed a penal offense.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether section 12 is anything new. I wish to ask him if it is not covered by sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Sherman antitrust law? I wish to ask him if the section was necessary in order to prosecute the officers and agents of corporations under that law? I wish to ask him if he thinks that any officer or employee of a corporation or other master can escape criminal punishment, criminal responsibility, by saying that he was a mere officer or agent of a corporation? There are no agencies in crime; all are guilty. The original act provides that the word "person" as used in the first three sections shall include both persons and corporations, and prosecutions of the officers and agents of corporations have been going on under the act. This adds nothing to the Sherman law. It is already the law of the land.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if that would not be the case whether sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 were in or not?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; it would not as to the Sherman law.

Mr. WALSH. Or any other law?

Mr. SHIELDS. But the criminal provisions in sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 relate to violations of those specific causes and of the acts intended to be prohibited and made unlawful, whether they constitute restraint of trade, or whether monopolies or not; and they are only in violation of the Sherman law, and they are only punished under it when they do consummate restraints of trade and monopolies of commerce. It is necessary to have them in connection with these three clauses, two of them now knocked out, with sections 8 and 9 in order to make criminal those particular acts, those particular schemes, those particular devices and badges and first steps of crime.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, answering the Senator's question, there is a possibility, I think, that section 12 may have in a slight degree broadened the law with reference to a prosecution of the officers of a corporation under the Sherman Antitrust Act and the amendments thereto. It may be that by the employment of the language "every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, who shall have aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, or procured such violation" we make it a little broader than the law is now, but I doubt it very much.

But, Mr. President, I do not want to get away from the question I am discussing.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator proceeds I should like to help to get the matter clear. The Senator is not now, as I understand him, doing anything more than discussing the matters he discussed here before, namely, that we ought to reinstate sections 2 and 4 with the penal provisions in them. In other words, the discussion of the present plan is a continuation of the discussion that we supposed we had passed upon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have never yet for even one moment of time discussed the question of the restoration of the penal provisions of section 4 in the Senate. I did discuss it in the committee. However, I desire to stick to my theme and to dispose of one thing at a time. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] asked the very pertinent question, "What are the practices covered by sections 2, 4, 8, and 9?" Will the Senator not get the bill and follow me?

Section 2 is aimed at a discrimination in the prices between different communities. It seeks to prevent a practice which has been commonly charged against the Standard Oil and other great concerns, namely, of maintaining high prices or satisfactory prices to them in the great body of the country, but in some State or some community, for the purpose of destroying a competitor, of dropping their prices there locally until the competitor is driven out of business, is bankrupted and ruined. Then, having driven competition from the field and established a complete monopoly, they raise the price so as to recoup all losses, and at the same time they have rid themselves of a troublesome competitor.

Now, that is the particular form of practice that has been denounced here on this floor as one class of unfair competition. It is the particular form that has been condemned by the statutes of Kansas and by the statutes of some 10 or 11 other States; I want to see it stopped. If you had 50 trade commissions I want somebody to tell me why Congress should not specify that particular act and denounce it here and now as criminal. To do so will not interfere with the trade commission; it will help the trade commission; it will not destroy its power; it will make the path certain and the remedy complete. All you have done is to provide a penalty of fine and imprisonment which can be enforced without in any way interfering with the trade commission. But when you place these practices exclusively in the control of the trade commission by amending the bill as it has been proposed to be amended, you take away every penalty and every punishment except that a man can be punished for contempt if he does not obey a decree of the court based upon a trade-commission order and obtained after 8 or 9 years of litigation. The trusts want nothing better than to have this thing done. Now, I answer further——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Would the Senator be willing to wait until I get through with section 4? Section 4 provided in particular terms, I may say, against "tying contracts," an infamous practice that has grown up since the decision of the cases I referred to the other day, by which a corporation having some patented article attaches to it a little notice to the effect that the man who uses that patented article shall buy certain other goods and certain other supplies exclusively from the man who sold the patented article. Section 4 covered that practice but was somewhat broader. It provided that a man could not make a sale and attach a condition to it compelling the purchaser to buy from him and him alone.

That is a favorite device of the monopolist. In my speech made last week I read you the warning that was given by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. I read you the opinion of the Supreme Court saying that legislation is necessary if the evil is to be arrested. With plain evidence before us that this favorite device of men who do not hesitate to pluck and plunder the public is constantly being employed, with the fact that we Democrats pledged ourselves by criminal provisions of the law to punish those who thus oppress the public also before us, you strike out the criminal provisions of these sections and turn "the malefactors" over to the tender mercies of a trade commission.

The trade commission can send nobody to jail. It can impose no fine. It can not levy a penalty of one single penny. It is powerless and without force until a court, at the end of long litigation, has affirmed its judgment of injunction.

Thus you take from the condemnation of the criminal law these infamous practices I have described. We Democrats at Baltimore said that "a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," and we pledged ourselves to strengthen the trust laws. Now you propose to take these practices that we said we would prohibit and put them in a class by themselves where a trade commission, without any power whatever except to issue an injunction that it can not enforce, is alone to protect the people against them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Missouri really intended to say what he has said. I do not think he intended to say that in the Democratic platform we promised the people to put penal provisions in this particular bill. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to read what we did say about it.

Mr. REED. I will yield to my friend for almost anything on earth, but just now I should like to get through with these four sections. Then I shall be willing to discuss the Democratic platform.

Section 9 of the bill as it came from the other House contained a provision prohibiting interlocking directorates—a common practice that has led to scandal in this country, that called for long sessions by a committee of the House of Representatives, and brought first to the attention of the public the great reformer, Mr. Untermyer, and threw him and certain other reformers into the spotlight. All will remember how the country was agitated from end to end. The interlocking-directorate problem is dealt with in section 9; we propose to stop it; but we approach the question very tenderly and very gingerly. We are afraid to affix a penalty; we are almost afraid to even prohibit the practice at all. And then we turn the enforcement over to a commission authorized to consider the question. If it does not think the practice is right, it may issue an injunction. We then provide carefully that there can be appeals to the courts. Through the long line of litigation the concern continues its practices; monopoly flourishes in the land like a green bay tree; and at the end of the litigation, mind you, there is not a penny of penalty exacted, not the forfeiture of a cent, not a day in jail. The offenders keep the profits they have made.

Section 8 provides that corporations can not acquire or hold any part of the capital stock of other corporations where the effect is to substantially lessen competition. What was that meant to strike? It was meant to strike the favorite device of the monopolist. At common law it was illegal for one corporation to hold the stock of another corporation. And why? Because it was contrary to public policy, because it was contrary to good morals, because it was contrary to good government for a corporation that was organized under the law, and given specific powers and required to have certain officers to manage its affairs, the stockholders of which were also given certain privileges and responsibilities, to have its affairs governed not by individuals, but by some other corporation. Hence it was regarded as bad policy to permit one corporation to acquire the control of another.

But what happened? That rule was relaxed; and so we find in this country a corporation organizing a brood of corporations, every day whelping a new litter, and operating them secretly and using them to deceive the public. I illustrated the evil the other day when I showed that the Harvester Trust bought out competitors and acquired stock control of competitors, and pretended that they were independent institutions, and advertised them to the world as competitors of the trust that all the time owned them. The Harvester Trust is not the only offender; the device has been commonly employed by the monopolies of the country. You, my brethren, have denounced these monopolistic devices upon the stump until you were hoarse and until your audience rose and applauded you to the echo. We pledged ourselves to enforce the criminal statutes against these institutions; we pledged ourselves not only in our platforms but upon the stump and through all our literature that we would bring these concerns to the bar as common criminals, and to-day we are back tracking. To-day we propose to strengthen the trust laws by providing a remedy which does not have a single tooth in all its soft and flabby gums; that will not even frighten a trust magnate; that will not make him pause, unless it be to express his feelings in derisive laughter.

I do not now complain of your trade commission bill; it may do some good; it may ascertain some facts. What I am protesting against is that you take the sword from the hand of justice simply because you are creating a trade commission. What I complain about is that you propose here and now to disarm the law of its weapons. Instead of giving to it the sword that is keen and two-edged and that pierces even to the dividing asunder of the soul and body and the joints and the marrow, you break that sword and supinely turn the monopolists over to a commission that can not even issue a civil decree that it can itself enforce.

Why not let the commission exist and also let the penalties of the law exist? Why not let the commission exist and do whatever good it can? But when we deal with these great evils that we all know are evils, that we have denounced on the stump, and that you have inveighed against night and morning and morning and night for lo these years, why not denounce them now by law, and why not add a penalty that will make that law a terror to evildoers?

What man organizing a trust and desiring to engage in one of the four practices named in these four sections upon which I have commented will pause in his course if you do not add a penalty? If you were organizing a combination and working through these means, would you hesitate because you might some day be called before a trade commission, and if, after hearing and after all the delays you could get, you might have an order issued by that commission that you should stop? What burglar would stop robbing a house if, after he had been captured, the severest penalty the court could impose would be to issue an injunction providing "You shall stop where you are. What swag you have already in your pocket you may carry away, but what you have not yet stolen you shall leave"?

What man will stop practicing monopolistic methods if he knows that at the end of the litigation the worst that can happen to him is the cost of the case on appeal and that all the profits he made shall be his to keep and enjoy?

I am astounded to find Democrats sitting here and Republicans sitting yonder indulging compassion and tenderness for the conspirators who follow these methods of monopoly. I can have some sympathy, sir, with those who say that there is a shadow ground and that in that shadow ground men may wander and their feet stumble; but I am not now speaking of shadow cases; I am speaking of the gentleman who deliberately, with his eyes open, starts in to gain control of other corporations by getting hold of their stock in order to remove them from the field of competition, who does it with that purpose in his mind; I am talking of the case, now, of a man who goes out into a community for the purpose of wrecking his competitor and establishing his monopoly and cuts prices locally so that he can destroy the man who ventures against him; I am talking now about the system devised in the brain of monopolists to create a monopoly in the shape of a dozen or a hundred independent corporations, all held together by the links of interlocking directorates. I am talking about these plain matters that are against the policy of the law and that ought to be expressly condemned, and I am demanding, so far as I can demand, that these practices shall bring with them a penalty that will warn the evildoers. I am speaking to the Senate with all the earnestness and solemnity that I can give to an utterance. If we adjourn this Congress having done nothing but create this milk-and-water pabulum, we may be sure the trusts will take it without a grimace, because they will know that the people of the United States must for many years to come take the medicine they mix.

Mr. President, I have briefly stated these propositions. I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to the committee's amendment. I insist that there shall go back into this bill all of the criminal provisions contained in the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives. If it is in order, I desire to move as a substitute for the amendment the language of section 4 of the House bill, which was stricken out by the committee and which reads:

> Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

And upon that at the proper time I shall ask for a roll call.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has not debated the question before the Senate. He has, however, argued a very interesting question, and I desire to follow him for a moment in the consideration of the matters which he has presented.

The question before the Senate is not whether the law shall be enforced through a commission or through the criminal courts; the question is whether, if the law in these respects is to be enforced through a commission, it shall be enforced in the way reported by the Senate committee, or whether it shall be enforced in the way adopted in the trade commission bill. I will come to that presently. I wish now to consider the four sections reviewed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and ascertain if I can whether the House has presented to us so drastic and so efficient a remedy for the evils which we all know exist.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator says that the question before the Senate I did not discuss. I made a motion to reinstate the language of the House bill, and that is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] offered an amendment to the committee amendment, the former having the approval, as I understand, of a majority of the members of the Judiciary Committee. That amendment proceeds upon the hypothesis that these sections are to be enforced through the commission; and the question that we would be called upon to decide in voting upon that amendment is whether we prefer the procedure reported by the Judiciary Committee or the procedure affirmed by the Senate by vote in the consideration of the trade commission bill. However, I do not intend to allow this occasion to pass without a little consideration of the matters suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa the question I was going to ask the Senator from Missouri a few moments ago. If we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and turn the enforcement of these provisions over to the trade commission entirely, then what is the necessity of having sections 2, 4, and 8 in this bill at all, or what is the necessity of proceeding as we are proceeding to deal with the subject in this bill? Sections 2, 4, and 8 simply define forms of unfair competition. The trade commission could take charge of those practices and find them to be unfair competition, and there would be no necessity for our defining them, unless we are going to enter upon the field of defining all forms of unfair competition. We have simply selected out three or four forms; but the trade commission would have jurisdiction to deal with the subject anyway; and I see no reason for such provisions being in this bill if the matter is going to be finally turned over to the trade commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho assumes a proposition which I do not at all admit. I do not admit that sections 8 and 9 cover a form or a method of unfair competition. I think they are entirely removed from that field.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; we will not debate that; but the Senator would not contend that sections 2 and 4 do not cover forms of unfair competition?

Mr. CUMMINS. I readily admit that section 2 covers a well-known form of unfair competition; I am not at all sure that section 4 does. My best judgment is that section 4 does not cover a form of unfair competition; but undoubtedly section 2 does; and the question presented by the amendment of the Senator from Montana, adopted by the committee, does not relate to any of these things; it relates simply to the procedure.

Assuming that the commission shall be given the power to enforce these sections, then it raises the exact issue that was presented to the Senate as between the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the amendment which I proposed, as to the merits of a broad and a narrow review, as to the effect which should be given to an order of the commission. That is the question presented by the amendment of the Senator from Montana, and it is, of course, supported by the additional consideration that it would be absurd for us to give the orders of the trade commission one effect in passing upon sections 2, 4, 8, and 9, and another in passing upon section 5 of the commission bill; and especially would it be unthinkable that we should take away from the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission an effect which they now have, an effect which has been declared over and over again by the Supreme Court of the United States, an effect which has been sustained after the most careful inquiry extending over a period of years, and practically destroy the usefulness of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I do not intend just at this moment to argue that question, however. I am interested in what the Senator from Missouri has said—that we are so tender of lawbreakers and law defiers that we desire to mitigate the punishment which they ought to receive, and allow them to go scot free for their crimes. Now, I fear that the bill as it came from the House, so far as sections 2, 8, and 9 are concerned, is grossly inadequate. I fear that it creates a refuge for lawbreakers and monopolists; and I now proceed to examine with some care these provisions.

I am not one of the men who have been opposed to attaching criminal penalties to offenses against the law. I think there are some regulations of commerce which we ought not to enforce through the criminal courts, but there are other regulations that we ought so to enforce. It all depends upon whether we can denominate the crime so clearly and so specifically that honest men may know what the law is with the certainty that a criminal law should always exhibit.

Let us see about section 2. I would look upon it as a national calamity if section 2 were enacted either in the form in which it came from the House or in the form in which it came from the Judiciary Committee. As the Senator from Missouri has said, it is intended to prevent the well-known practice of local price cutting or discrimination. The principle has been applied to many well-known commodities in the various States of the Union, to oil, to lumber, and in some States to every commodity. But listen:

That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities—

Now, as the House had it—in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States.

And there I might suggest to my learned friend from Tennessee that this section is open to all the constitutional objections which he presented this afternoon with so much vigor and so much emphasis.

I proceed to read:

Which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia, * * * with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller.

That in itself contains a qualification which neutralizes in great measure the effect of the law, because it would be practically impossible for the Government to prove that it was done with the purpose or intent to wrongfully injure the business of a competitor, or to destroy it.

That, however, is a little thing as compared with what follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodities sold—

If, by changing in any degree the quantity of the commodity sold as between purchasers, the seller is permitted to make the discrimination which is recognized to be so great an evil, tell me who would ever fall within the prohibition of the law, or within the penalty which it prescribes. Upon its very face it destroys itself.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator tell us how it would come within the scope of section 5 of the trade commission bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not discussing section 5 of the trade commission bill. I will, however, tell the Senator from Minnesota later how it would come within that section.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator tell us how this is covered by section 5? If it is not covered by that, what covers it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am discussing the proposition of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I know the Senator from Minnesota is very anxious to sustain the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, and I am attacking it. I say that the bill as it came from the House and as it came from the Judiciary Committee will afford little or no relief whatsoever to the people of this country against the evil which has been so graphically and so justly denounced.

Mr. NELSON. What will section 5 of the trade commission bill cover on that subject?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota when I reach that point in the consideration of the matter; but he must not require me to anticipate my argument just at this moment.

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance—

Now, mark you—

that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation—

I pause there a moment—"difference in the cost of selling or transportation." We are here invited into a field so broad that human vision can scarcely see its boundaries. What an inquiry it would ask the Government to make as to the difference between the cost of selling in a particular locality as compared with the cost of selling in another locality! We might as well have no prohibition at all as to include words of that character.

But that is not all—

Or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition and not intended to create monopoly.

If the practice is intended to create monopoly, it is already denounced by the antitrust law, and we need no further protection on account of such methods of business.

Made in good faith to meet competition—

Imagine the Government endeavoring to prove that a particular instance of price-cutting was not made in good faith to meet competition! But that is not all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I shall be very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. I do not think there is the slightest difficulty about the proposition the Senator is discussing.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I know the Senator from Missouri does not think so. He has already said so. I do think so, however.

Mr. REED. I think I can give a reason for my position. Manifestly, if two men are in competition at a given place—let us say the Standard Oil Co. and an independent company—and the independent concern should drop the price of gasoline to 11 cents, and the Standard Oil Co. should meet it, that would be an act done in good faith to meet competition. If, however, the Standard Oil Co. were to drop the price of gasoline to 5 cents, a price less than the article could be produced for, and kept it up to 11 or 12 cents somewhere else, and carried it out and kept it up so that it drove the independent concern out of business, there would not be any difficulty at all in a jury finding that they did not do it in good faith. I will undertake, in any reasonably plain case, any outrageous case, to get a verdict every time under that section.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator probably could get a verdict from a jury in an outrageous case, but we are not making this law to arrest the progress of monopoly in outrageous cases only. We are making it to preserve competition. That is our object. If that is not our object, we have none.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator and myself is this: He admits now that this law would stop the outrageous case——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not admit it.

Mr. REED. But because it would not stop all cases he therefore will have no law at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri is very skillful in the use of words, but he can not induce me to fall into the error which his statement of my position would put me in. I do not say that this would meet every outrageous case. It would not. So far as concerns the test of meeting in good faith competition that existed, it might; but there are so many loopholes in the section that if the transgressor did not escape from one he would be very sure to find ready egress from another.

That is not all the section contains, however.

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

That legalizes a form of piracy which has been well recognized as unfair competition, and would destroy in large measure the efficiency of this section, even if it contained no other exception. I can not be wrong when I assert that if "unfair competition" means what we have been led to believe it means—and now I am answering the Senator from Minnesota—if "unfair competition" means what the Supreme Court has said it means, what every writer upon the subject has said it means, what the statutes of other countries have declared it means, then every instance of local price-cutting that injures the public by tending to destroy competition through these means would be prohibited, and the offender would not be able to escape by appealing to the rigid language of a criminal law.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I am quite willing to be interrupted. I am on that subject now.

Mr. NELSON. There are one or two questions I should like to suggest to the Senator from Iowa.

Is not the central idea of the antitrust law to keep open the avenues of competition? And if that is true, then is not this proposition, as involved in section 5 of the trade commission bill, the opposite? Is not that to give the opportunity to these trusts to come in and get somebody to complain and say, "I am not guilty of unfair competition," and get a decree of a court or of the commission, and in that way absolve themselves from prosecution under the antitrust law? Is not that the central idea? Is not that what they are aiming for?

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator asking whether that is my idea?

Mr. NELSON. I am asking if that is not the effect of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator did not ask about the effect of it. He asked whether it was not the idea of those who had proposed and who were endeavoring to maintain it. The first question could be asked only upon the assumption that the Senator from Minnesota believes that those who favor section 5 are the friends of monopoly and are endeavoring to fasten its hold upon the business of the United States. Knowing him as I do, I assume that he did not intend any offense of that kind. If he did, I might well decline to answer his question. If he intended to ask, however, as he put it afterwards, whether the effect of the enforcement of section 5 of the trade commission bill would be to legalize monopoly and to strengthen its power, I say, emphatically, "No." I believe, and I believe sincerely, that the proper enforcement of section 5 of the trade commission bill will do more to keep the channels of trade free and open, will do more to preserve permanent and enduring competition in the business and commerce of the United States, than the Sherman antitrust law has ever done, or than any provision in the so-called Clayton bill can do. That is my honest opinion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator would agree, however, that it would depend entirely upon the attitude of mind of the particular trade commission who are passing upon the question of unfair competition. Suppose a trade commission should be composed of men who had the view that Judge Sanborn had the other day in regard to the Harvester Trust?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, I agree to that. I agree that we may be injured by an erroneous interpretation of the law, whether the men compose courts or commissions. I agree that if the Supreme Court of the United States had adhered to the doctrine which it announced in the case of Knight against Leonard the antitrust law would long ago have ceased to be of any value whatever. But the people of this country——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary that the purpose may be dishonest or disloyal. It may be based upon an honest difference of opinion as to what constitutes competition or unfair competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that.

Mr. BORAH. I think Judge Sanborn, as a lawyer and as a judge, honestly arrived at the conclusion which he reached.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of it. The courts have it in their power to wreck our institutions. Their construction or interpretation of the Constitution can destroy all advance or progress. The political parties that are elected from time to time can retard the forward movement of humanity.

I assume in all that I do or say that the men who are intrusted with power in this country will in the end be in sympathy with the best thought of the country, and that they will interpret and administer our laws in harmony with that thought and for the welfare of all the people.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to make a motion for a recess?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 26, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 25, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, whose glory shines round about us with increasing brightness day by day and whose love touches with insistence every heart hour by hour, open Thou our eyes to that glory and our hearts to that love, that we may know Thee better and serve Thee by serving our fellow men with increased devotion and so fulfill the law and the prophets in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BELL of Georgia, for one week on account of illness.

REVOKING LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 601.

Resolved, That all leaves of absence heretofore granted to Members are hereby revoked.

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms is hereby directed to notify all absent Members of the House by wire that their presence in the House of Representatives is required, and that they must return without delay to Washington.

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms is directed to enforce the law requiring him to deduct from the salary of the Members their daily compensation when they are absent for other cause than sickness of themselves and their families.

[Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman want time? If so, I will yield to him.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think the resolution is privileged at this stage of the proceedings, but it could easily be made privileged, and I shall not make the point of order against it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that the resolution concerns the most important question that the House is involved in, and that is the question of getting a quorum, and must be for that reason of the highest privilege. If the gentleman desires time, I will yield.

Mr. MANN. I do not care to discuss the resolution. I simply wish to have the RECORD show that it is not by unanimous consent conceded that the resolution is privileged at this time. The presumption is when the House meets that all Members have complied with the rule which requires them to be present in the House. Of course, if a roll call were had, and that could easily be had, and it showed Members were absent, the resolution might then be privileged, but I have no desire to compel the gentleman to go through——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may have a record, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman, if he desires merely a vote of a quorum to pass the resolution, that he will withhold that. That question can be determined upon a vote on the resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. I would as soon have it that way as the other.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman withhold it?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House in a discussion of this question. The resolution shows on its face what it is. Now, I do not offer this resolution as a matter of criticism of my brother Members. I offer it as a governmental necessity. I appreciate and realize the difficulty of every Member of this House, that has been confronting him for the last six months and will confront him in the two months yet to come, that this is a political year, and that he naturally wants to be home part of his time; but the question that confronts us is, Are we going to stay here and attend to the Government's business or are we going to go home and attend to our political business? Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, it is far better for this House and the country that we stay here, attend to business, and keep a quorum on the floor of this House, so that business may be attended to by a majority of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then if the exigency of the public business carries us close to the day of election, it would be far better for this House, with the consent of the Senate, or for the two Houses, to take a recess and let everybody go home. It is not fair to the membership of this House who have stayed here through this long summer and attempted to do business to be kept here when we can not do business, while Members who neglect their duties get the advantage of being home. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So, as there is no other way of enforcing a quorum in Washington, I think the law of the land should be enforced. [Applause.] If a Member finds it is more important for him to stay in his district and work for himself than to stay in Washington and work for his Government, he ought not to ask the Government of the United States to pay him his salary while he is absent from this Hall. [Applause.] Therefore, unless some gentleman——

Mr. MANN. I would like some little time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MANN. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are only a few of the Members of the House who have remained in continuous session during more than a year past. In the recent months a majority of the Democratic Members from the Southern States, whose nominations are equivalent to an election, have been absent from the House attending to their primary campaigns; and, now that all primary nominations have been made in these usually Democratic States, our southern friends virtuously propose that they will stay in Washington, having no campaign on their hands, and keep the northern Members, where there is a fight in their district, in Washington away from their districts. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is a virtue which is assumed, and which is stronger in its assumption and presumption than in any other way. It is true that Congress has been in continuous session for more than a year. It is also true that under a proper management by the majority side of the House Congress could have enacted all the legislation that was necessary in six months of that time. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have dawdled along in recent months, hard to get a quorum because of the absence of our southern friends attending properly to their primary campaigns and their nominating conventions. To-day, if we would adjourn Congress and go home and give the people a chance to develop the present possibilities by individual efforts, the country would be far better off than it will be by staying here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is not likely that under any circumstances, if Congress remains in session, that I personally would leave its sessions or the city of Washington, but I do not believe that it was contemplated or necessary to deduct the salary of any northern Member of Congress on either side who may be engaged in a campaign in his district, in order to let the people of his district know the issues which are before them. The best thing that could happen to the country is to let some of our friends on both sides go out into the country and campaign before the people and let the people speak with a knowledge of the questions which are pending. Of course, the proposition which is now presented will probably be a greater personal injury to the Members on this side of the House than it will to the Members on that side of the House, but it is an unfair proposition even to the northern Democrats in the House, who probably will not undertake to speak for themselves, but who will feel the outrage that is proposed to be committed against them to keep them here out of their campaign, which is a campaign not for nomination but for election, while our southern friends, having stayed away while they were being nominated, now have no fight over the election. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made a very convincing argument if his statement could be sustained by the facts.

I always regret to see a sectional line drawn in this House, but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that if he wants to draw a sectional line in reference to the men who stay on the job in Washington and attend to their business, he will find that the southern Member stays here a very much greater percentage of his time than any other Member of this House.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that what he says about the membership of the House leaving here to go home and attend to their primary elections is not warranted by the facts, only in exceptional cases. I know that when the primary election in Alabama took place, with one exception the Alabama delegation was on the floor of this House attending to its duties. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I know that is true in most of the other Southern States.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman willing to take the record of roll calls on the Alabama delegation during that time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I am.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I insist that we should proceed in order. Two gentlemen rose at the same time and injected remarks in the talk of the gentleman from Alabama—the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It is not fair to the membership of the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's statement that I did not ask permission is false.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, the real question the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has not faced. It is not the question as to whether this resolution bears heavily on the membership of this House, for I concede that it does; but it is the question as to whether it ought to bear heavily on absenteeism from this House. The gentleman says that the reason we are here is because we have not transacted business. Why, when we transacted business in this House, the important business, the claim came from that side of the House that we transacted it too rapidly, not too slowly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We are detained here this summer, as everybody knows, because of the trust legislation that is in the Senate. We passed that legislation through this House after a little over three weeks of consideration. We could not adjourn in the meantime, and now the Congress is facing the necessity of passing additional revenue legislation, caused by the disruption of our customs revenue by reason of the war in Europe. We will probably lose $100,000 000 of revenue because the customs revenues are cut off from Europe. Before we adjourn it will be necessary to pass a bill to meet that condition. The country is at stake. The business interests of the country are at stake. There is distress all over the land growing out of the disruption of business caused by the European conditions, and for any Member of Congress to say now that he places his individual fortune and the necessity to take care of his individual fortune above his duty to the country, in my judgment proclaims that Member unpatriotic and unworthy of a seat on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me two minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask some gentleman from South Carolina a question. I have no desire to specify a particular Member. Is there any Member from South Carolina present who would be willing to answer a question?

Mr. POU. There are several from North Carolina who would be willing to answer a question.

Mr. MANN. You have had your primaries.

Mr. POU. Yes; and we stayed here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may have stayed here.

Mr. WEBB. I stayed here, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. To-day they are having primaries in South Carolina, and no Member from that State is here. That has been the case with most of the Southern States during the holding of the primaries. The gentleman said I was mistaken. Well, I just call attention to the actual case. The gentlemen from South Carolina, just as honest, just as good, and just as patriotic as Members living in any of the other Southern States, are at home to-day looking after their fences. If they were here to-morrow, they would be glad to vote for this resolution to keep the gentlemen from the North, who have fights for election, here. They are through with their own fight.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I am in harmony with the idea that we ought to have a quorum, but I am not going to say anything about that. I want to make a few general remarks for the "good of the order." I do that as a business man and not as a frequent speaker on the floor of the House. If there is anything the matter with Congress and its long sessions, it is due to the fact that a half dozen men on that side of the House and a half dozen men on this side of the House are continually consuming the time of the Congress by speech making which ought to be devoted to real legislation. The same is not only true of this branch of the Congress, but it is true elsewhere in the Nation's councils. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Think of going to church every day of the week the year round and listening to the same preachers five or six hours a day and you will understand why it is hard to keep a quorum in the House.

When bills come up for serious and businesslike consideration on the floor of the House, day after day we see men, instead of attempting to consider bills as they should, filibustering by long speech making and delaying legislation. It is a fact that the business interests of the country have become impatient and have become woefully tired of the long talk, talk, talk of both Houses of Congress. I believe that the time is here, Mr. Speaker, when the business interests and the general welfare of the country are going to demand that Congress shall do less talking and more business. [Applause.] If we would give more time to the real business of legislation and less to long-winded speech making, more time to public business and less to public ear tickling, we would not be here all the year round with such a tedious program that Members become worn out listening and waiting, and absent themselves occasionally as a matter of health and necessity. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman desire some time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House now for almost 12 years, and during that entire time I have never gone home to look after my political affairs when Congress was in session. I therefore think that I can make a few statements about this proposed resolution without having any personal interests in mind.

I do believe that the proposed resolution is unfair to the northern membership of this House on both sides of the aisle. There is something more to consider than the personal interests of the particular candidates. It will soon become one of the highest duties of this membership to go out and discuss public questions before their constituents. So far as I recall, every Southern State has now had its primaries except South Carolina, where the primary is held to-day. I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the fact that I stood here upon the floor of this House three or four weeks ago and called the roll of the distinguished gentlemen from the South that were absent. I do not think there is any more emergency now for keeping a quorum here than there was then. We would have been through with the work if they had been kept here, and I think it is unfair to both the northern Democrats and the northern Republicans to pass this resolution.

As to these southern Democrats who are now practically reelected, why can they not stay here now and keep a quorum so that the other Members of this body, if they so desire, may go home to look after their affairs? For one I do not expect to go, but I think that it is asking more than is fair for the gentleman from Alabama, after these southern Members are practically reelected, to insist that the other Members stay here now and keep a quorum or else be penalized for their absence. Why can not these southern gentlemen, who are practically reelected, stay here and keep a quorum so that business can be transacted? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a more important resolution than this has been brought upon the floor of the House in the last 10 years. I am utterly unable to conceive in my mind of any legislation that is more important than this. I am not concerned with the question of the fairness or the unfairness of the resolution. It is absolutely and eternally fair to both the North and the South. [Applause.] I can not conceive of any business that Members have or should have as important as being here. He be strong or weak, he should be here looking after public business. We have been running here short-handed for three months. The highest number we have reached during this period of time on roll calls is about 230, although the total membership of the House is 431. Yesterday we fooled away two hours' time trying to get a quorum on a roll call, and in less than 10 minutes after a quorum was secured a point of order was made that a quorum was not present, and a second roll call developed the fact again that a quorum was not present. Where are these absentees? Where have they been? What have they been doing? Have they been serving their country in their absence from the House, or have they been serving their own private, personal benefit or suiting their own whims and caprices? A large number of them have been back home in their districts trying to renominate themselves. Others have been back home for months trying to secure a nomination for the United States Senate. Others have been back home practicing law, medicine, and following their usual avocations of life, while others have been away from here for weeks and months on the Chautauqua platform trying to tell the dear people of the country of the woeful conditions in which they live, drawing down two hundred per, instead of being here trying and honestly endeavoring to shape and fashion good legislation so as to elevate the people from the woeful conditions in which they say the people find themselves by reason of lack of proper legislation. This absenteeism from the House has come to the point where it has become a national scandal and a public disgrace; and yet during all their absence from the House they have been drawing their $24 per day from the Treasury of the United States, paid to them by the toilers of the Nation. Call the roll and see how many chairmen of important committees have been absent during the last three months. The very fellows who are supposed to be the organization men of the House—where are they, and why have they been absent?

Every Member knows that it is the ambition of everyone when he becomes a Member of this House to become a chairman of some committee, because it gives him a prestige and power that he does not otherwise have, and yet many of these chairman have been gone for weeks and months. No leave of absence has been secured for any of them on the ground of sickness of himself or any member of his family, but they have deliberately pulled up stakes, folded their tents, and "hiked" back either to their districts, the Chautauqua platform, or to the seashore resort, and having a good time at public expense, while the remainder of us, who have not been favored with committee assignments, are supposed to remain here on duty, day in and day out, to keep a quorum so as to enable the House to do business. I can not believe that if the country knew of these conditions that it would stand for it for a moment. It ought not to stand for it.

The absentee Members of the Democratic side pretend to be followers of our splendid President, Woodrow Wilson; and this fall, if they get the opportunity, they will be telling their dear people how hard and valiantly they fought in Congress in order to put through the administration legislative program; what a contrast, Mr. Speaker, between the actions of President Wilson on the one side and absenteeism on the other. Our splendid President took the oath of office on March 4, 1913, and I dare say that during all this period of time he has not been absent from his post of duty to exceed 10 days, every day doing his duty as the Executive of the Nation while those absent Members have been away from here looking after their own individual interests.

During the past three months the average number of Members absent each day was about 205, and during this time these absent Members have drawn from the Public Treasury of the United States not less than $442,800. Have they earned this while away from here back in their districts fighting for a renomination, attending to private and personal affairs, practicing law, or on the Chautauqua platforms, getting from one to two hundred dollars per lecture? Let the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD answer this question. Let the taxpayers answer it when they come to read the hundreds of roll calls that the RECORD will show since the beginning of this Congress. Let them contrast this line of conduct with the conduct of President Wilson and see whether or not they have stood by their post of duty, as they pledged the people they would when the people elected them to Congress. My experience, Mr. Speaker, has been that if a man comes here and does his duty there will be no occasion for him to go back home when he finds himself involved in a fight for renomination. I have had two hard fights for renomination. I left it entirely to the people. I had no trouble in winning, and when the time comes that I have to go home to be renominated I will accept defeat willingly rather than desert what I regard as my duty. For more than 20 years we have had a law that requires the Sergeant at Arms to deduct our pay when absent, except on account of sickness of ourselves or members of our families, and everybody knows that this law has been a dead letter and has never been enforced, and I trust the Speaker will see to it that this law will be religiously enforced and that every Member's salary will be deducted for every day absent, except in cases of sickness.

Congress is a lawmaking body, making laws to govern a hundred million people, and how can we expect the people to respect our laws if we refuse to enforce them ourselves? The way to make the people respect the laws we make is to respect them ourselves, and the way to respect this law is to enforce it rigorously against every Member of the House. In less than two days after this resolution passes we will have a quorum. Of this there will be no doubt. The Chautauqua platform, the practice of law, and the usual avocation back home will have no inducement whatever for the absentee when he finds himself separated from the pay roll. He will hustle in here in a flying machine, if he can hire one at any price.

A public office is a public trust, and a public trust should never be abused by a public officer; but public trusts have been abused here. Let the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD speak. Observe the hundreds of roll calls and note the 200 or more Members who at each roll call fail to answer to their names.

I believe when the people elect a man to Congress that constitutes a contract between the Member on one side and his constituents on the other, and I do not believe that any Member has a moral, legal, or political right to violate the contract without being held morally and politically responsible before the country. A Member should have no excuse for being absent while Congress is in session except for sickness of himself or some member of his family, in which case not only the House but his constituents would agree to his absence.

This resolution is the best piece of legislation ever introduced in the House. Make the Members stay here, or, if they insist upon loafing at seaside resorts or on the Chautauqua platform, separate them from the pay roll. The people pay them for staying here while Congress is in session. They have no right to violate this agreement, draw their salary, go back home, and desert their post of duty. What would a farmer think who works from 12 to 15 hours a day if one of his hired hands was absent half the time? Would he feel like paying his servant for full time? Or what would the merchant or banker think if his clerk insisted upon being absent half the time if they were called upon to pay full wages? Think of the millions of laboring men in the country earning a dollar and a half per day, working from 10 to 12 hours per day every day in the year—they are required to be in the factory every morning when the whistle blows and remain at work until quitting time in the evening.

With the Mexican War situation on our hands, with all Europe engaged in a holocaust, with our President working day and night to keep us out of war with Mexico and doing his utmost to keep us from becoming embroiled in a foreign war, and needing the assistance of every Member of the House, patriotism to duty requires that we be on guard as the representatives of the people. Let no man fail to do his duty, let no man shirk responsibility, let the Member either stay here or else decently resign, and let another take his place, or else let him willingly separate himself from the pay roll and turn the money back into the Public Treasury which he does not and can not earn while absent from here. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. I notice that the resolution provides that absence on account of sickness shall be affected also.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the law.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. The law provides that the Sergeant at Arms shall deduct a Member's salary when he is absent unless he is excused on account of sickness for himself and his family, and the resolution complies with the law.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will ask the gentleman if he will amend his resolution so as to make it applicable from the beginning of the session? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; we can not do that. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I would do it very cheerfully. It will not affect me in any way. But——

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not, of course, tell the Sergeant at Arms to call back that which has passed under the hopper.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. What is the objection to making this resolution cover all absentees from the beginning of the session, in all fairness to the Members of the House, those who have had primaries and those who have not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that in a separate resolution if you want to introduce it. I am not willing to have this resolution amended now because it is offered for a particular purpose, and that is to bring the Members back to Washington.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman be willing to yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment, so as to test the sense of the House as to extending the deduction of pay back to the beginning of the session or the beginning of the Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not willing to yield at this time for that purpose, because I think the resolution I have offered covers the question.

Mr. MANN. While the resolution is under consideration will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The difference is this——

Mr. MANN. I am asking the gentleman whether he is willing to yield for that purpose?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself are concerned, we have not been away except on account of sickness when the House was transacting business, but a good many other Members have been away at times when they did not realize that there was any penalty. I am not prepared at this time to penalize those Members without notice. I would not attempt to do so now if the necessities of the occasion did not require it. I stated over three weeks ago that it was necessary for the House to maintain a working quorum here at all times and gave notice that if a working quorum was not maintained I would at least test the sentiment of this House and give it an opportunity to vote on this resolution. In the last few days we have been barely getting a quorum. Most of our time has been spent in efforts to get a quorum, and now, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the resolution revokes all leaves of absence, so that hereafter a Member who is absent, no matter what the excuse may be, unless he gets a further leave, will not be able to draw his salary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that this resolution can not change the law.

Mr. MANN. No; but the law provides that the deduction shall be made except when the man is excused by reason of illness of himself or family; but that excuse has to be obtained in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MANN. I am.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My recollection is that the law provides that a man shall not draw his salary unless he is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MANN. Unless he is excused, as I recall it, and the leave has to be given by the House, and the gentleman proposes to revoke leaves of absence which have been granted on account of illness.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that the House can regrant leaves of absence on account of sickness.

Mr. MANN. It can by unanimous consent, which will probably not be granted.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is contemplated by the resolution that a Member is to be considered in attendance when he is not in his seat during the hours of the session, or whether he complies with the resolution when he is getable when he is needed, and is in the city of Washington.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, the resolution does not fix the status. The law fixes it, and that law has been on the statute book for many years. The law provides that when a man is absent on any ground, except that of sickness of himself or his family, his salary shall be deducted. I did not understand that to mean that a man shall be in the Hall of the House every minute of the day.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If a Member is absent from the House here for five or six days and there is no roll call in the meantime, how is the Sergeant at Arms to know whether he is absent, or whether he has been present?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a question for the Sergeant at Arms to determine, and it may be possible that some gentlemen may escape the penalty; but I have no doubt the Sergeant at Arms will attempt to do his duty, just as the Sergeant at Arms did in the Fifty-third Congress. This resolution was passed in the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume the Sergeant at Arms will be required to keep a time book, and have every Member stop and ring the clock as he passes the door of the Sergeant at Arms. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose the Sergeant at Arms can attend to that proposition when he gets to it.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MADDEN. I should like a minute or two.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] desire time?

Mr. FALCONER. I want a little time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time?

Mr. FALCONER. Two or three minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] desire to ask me a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I want a few minutes, to speak about the Fifty-third Congress. I was here——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Would the gentleman from Alabama object to having his resolution amended so as to provide that immediately upon the approval of the Journal each morning there shall be a roll call, and the absentees determined from that roll call unless excused during the day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have no objection to that if it is necessary, but the Sergeant at Arms can first try the other way, and if he can not work it out in any other way——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I suppose Members could get here in time for that roll call.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no trouble about getting a roll call at any time. We have half a dozen every day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, before this debate is concluded I should like about two minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman, but I will first yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, this is a perfectly lovely time for the gentleman from Alabama to present a resolution of this character. I doubt very much whether a single Member from the State of Alabama did not find it convenient for some reason or other to spend a certain number of days in his State before the primaries. It may have been on account of "illness" or it may have been for personal political aggrandizement. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I and other Members from the State of Washington have been on the floor of this House practically every day during this session of Congress. We have heard complaints here at times about western Members getting too much consideration at the hands of Congress, but there have been times when the western Members largely represented the total number of Members on the floor of the House. The delegation from New York, the delegation from Alabama, the delegation from practically every Southern State and from many of the Northern States have found it convenient to be away from here just before their primaries. To-day South Carolina is holding primaries and not a Member of that delegation is present, and these primaries mark the last of the Southern State contests. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the State of Washington we have as lively a lot of political workers as are to be found in any State in the Union. Just at this time the pressure is great for some of us to go home and make a fight for our respective candidacies. We had hoped that we might have a week's vacation to go home and vote. We had not thought of shirking our duty. We had hoped, however, that the Democratic two-thirds majority would see to it that a sufficient number of Democrats would be present to maintain a working quorum to uphold the hands of the President in these stirring times of war, when problems involving American commerce and shipping are perplexing the minds of men who know the necessity for moving American products.

Why does not the gentleman from Alabama word his resolution to include the absentees of the Alabama delegation who made it convenient to spend their time looking after their own political fortunes during their primary contests rather than giving their mental and physical energy to the work of the House and the welfare of their country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say that the gentleman's statement with reference to the Alabama delegation is not true.

Mr. FALCONER. Did not the gentleman from Alabama, in common with his colleagues, find it convenient to go home before the primaries?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I went back home to vote, and that is all.

Mr. FALCONER. I do not criticize the gentleman for going home to vote. As a matter of courtesy between Members, everyone should be permitted to do that; but, Mr. Speaker, it takes five days to go to the west coast, and I have not been in my State this year. I am a candidate for the United States Senate and have a State-wide contest now on. I have felt that I owed it to myself, my friends, and my constituents to present myself to the voters of my State for a few days preceding the primaries in order that I might personally define my position on national questions, but important legislation has kept me here to this late day.

I am desirous of doing the work I find here in Congress. I appreciate my responsibility as a Member of this body and shall remain to do my duty and discharge my obligation. I vote for the resolution and hope to see many of the long-absent Democratic Members in their seats. My friends who are active in my State know I am here on the job.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that in the consideration of a question of this sort the interest of the country should be paramount. Politics should be set aside and patriotism should be the only consideration. Everybody all over the country looks to the Congress to meet whatever situation may arise and to endeavor to settle the troubles pending all over the world. They want the Members of Congress here. Most of the Members of Congress are here the greater part of the time. I have been away sometimes, but never on political business. I believe, however, that whatever is done about deducting the compensation of Members ought to apply to everybody, past, present, and future. I am perfectly willing to have any time that I have been away deducted from my salary, but I want it to apply to every man in the House, not only to-day but to-morrow, yesterday, and the day before. The law provides that it is the duty of the Sergeant at Arms to do so. There is no need for us to tell him how he shall perform his duty. There is no need to say that in the future the Sergeant at Arms must enforce the law. He is under oath to do it. The question is, Who is going to decide whether a man is away on account of sickness in his family or whether he is sick himself; whether he is away because of some important business he has to attend to, or whether he is away because of a political emergency in his district, or whether he is away because he happens to have service on some committee of the House that calls him away? This resolution, so far as it relates to the deduction of the compensation of Members, simply complicates the situation. We agree that the necessity for remaining here comes from the situation throughout the world and the country, but if we are going to deduct a man's pay because of the urgency of the situation, I say that the resolution ought to be so amended as to carry it back the first day of the Congress, making it apply to every man who has been absent from the first to the close.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the only opposition to this resolution requiring the attendance of Members upon duty in this House comes from the Republican side. It is also apparent, Mr. Speaker, that all during this time there has been a majority of Democrats always in the House. But for that the little remnant of Republicans that you have got could have enacted law. You had to be in the minority. If you had been in the majority, you could have passed your laws.

Some gentlemen over there talk about Democrats being absent. A majority of them are always here. Of course you can come into the House sometimes when debate is long on some question and find the attendance small, but the other Members are close around—in committee, maybe. The Alabama delegation, the most of it, has remained here. I had no opposition.

The gentleman from the Montgomery district did not go home, and he had opposition. The Mississippi delegation did not go home. Others who had opposition did not go home except for a day or two before the primary in order to vote. The gentleman from Illinois speaks about southern Members being absent. The gentleman from Illinois never loses an opportunity to speak about sectional matters, and he tries to stir up sectional feeling and prejudice. Democrats, regardless of the North, East, West, and South, are demanding that the Republicans stay here and perform their duty.

We propose to keep you here now to transact the public business and put through measures that are important to the people of this country. Emergency conditions have been created, and it is very important to have a resolution like this, and I am glad that there is not a voice on this side of the House raised against it. We propose to keep you here and make you attend to your duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I was here when the resolution was passed in the Democratic Fifty-third Congress. I was the victim of the resolution to the extent of two or three days' salary. If this resolution passes now and this House does not have the good sense to adjourn by the 28th of September, when we have our primaries, I shall be a victim then; and if it still lingers in a senseless way, to see if something will not turn up, until we have our registration, a few weeks before election, I shall go home, because I am obliged to be there personally to register, and I will pay my penalty for that privilege.

And if you should not know enough to go home to vote on election day, I shall go, resolution or no resolution. But it will not last that long. It did not in the Fifty-third Congress. It did not last beyond the first month, and then the Sergeant at Arms no longer tried to keep the difference in pay back from any absent Member, although there were absentees then as now. My sympathy goes out to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] who the other day obtained leave of absence to go home to attend a convention of the Democratic Party during this week. Leave of absence was granted to him by unanimous consent by this House—Democrats, Republicans, and all. He has now gone home, and it is now the duty of the Sergeant at Arms, or will be—and I warn him of his duty under this resolution, which of course will pass—to deduct that man's pay for the time that he is there in Missouri, although he is there by the consent of the House.

There are other men absent, some of them without leave of absence and some with—not for sickness, but for other reasons. They have gone home, some of them, because of the general rule of the House that when a man wants to go he goes, whether it is to an Alabama primary or at any other time. He goes home. They are all caught by this resolution. It is not to take effect 5 days from now or 10 days from now, but it is to take effect immediately, and it is the duty of the Sergeant at Arms to check up his books every day, and whoever is absent has to pay a fine of about $25 for being absent. This law has been on the statute books for many years, but it has been in innocuous desuetude all of the time except that one month in the Fifty-third Congress, and it will be that way after this month, undoubtedly, in this Congress.

Oh, if you had only a little patriotic spirit and party pride on your side, with your two-thirds majority you would have a quorum here. Why, in the Fifty-first Congress, with only three majority on the Republican side, we mustered day after day a quorum of Republicans, and got within three all of the Republicans here to keep up a majority. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I promised first to yield to the gentleman from Colorado, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I represent a western constituency, and I have a contest in my primary. A mighty good man is trying to take the Democratic nomination from me, and he is making a vigorous campaign. Yet I feel that this resolution should be adopted, and I shall vote for it. I do not think it is necessary for any Democrat to go home. It is necessary for Republican Members to go home and explain, and it will be a very difficult explanation. All we have to say to our constituents is that we are staying here supporting Woodrow Wilson and his policies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. FALCONER. Has the Democratic majority had a sufficient number of Members here all of this session to support the President without the assistance of the Progressives and some Republicans?

Mr. KEATING. Oh, yes; the Democratic majority has been here supporting the President, and it is driving a lot of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle into supporting him.

Mr. FALCONER. Have you had a quorum here?

Mr. KEATING. That is sufficient. I will say to the gentleman that I have no desire to make light of the splendid support which the President has received from many gentlemen on that side of the House. I hope this resolution will be carried by Democratic votes. I would not object to inserting an exception to permit some of our Republican friends to go home and explain, but it is not necessary for any such exception to be put in to safeguard Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will stay here until this emergency has passed and until we receive word from our leader in the White House that we may go home.

This is not a hastily formed decision so far as I am concerned. My friends in Colorado have repeatedly urged me to return to my district and personally direct my campaign. I have sent the same reply to all in the form of the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 22, 1914.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I will not return to Colorado to participate in the campaign which will precede the primaries to be held on September 8. My opponents are seeking to take advantage of my absence, and I feel it is only just that my constituents should know why I have determined to remain in Washington while the representatives of the special interests I have refused to serve are "gumshoeing" through every county in my district pleading with the voters to defeat me for renomination.

President Wilson is facing the gravest crisis of his administration. The world's bloodiest war is convulsing Europe. A single diplomatic misstep might plunge our country into the maelstrom. In addition, the President's antitrust program is being held up in the Senate by the powerful interests which are determined that the people shall not secure relief from the exactions of monopoly.

At such a time the President needs the presence and support of every Member of Congress who believes in him and his policies.

So far as I am concerned, I will remain at my post until the big, patient leader in the White House gives the signal to return home.

In pursuing this course I know I am doing what the best men and women of my congressional district would have me do. The issues before the voters of the third district are easily understood:

I stand for Woodrow Wilson and his policies.

My opponents refuse to publicly indorse the President and in private they bitterly denounce him and his policies.

There is no reason why voters who believe in Wilson should vote against me, but there is every reason why those who are opposed to the President should exert themselves to bring about my defeat.

Yours, sincerely,

EDWARD KEATING.

Mr. Speaker, the people of this country are behind Woodrow Wilson to-day as they have not been behind any President since Lincoln's time. They believe in him and they want us to support him with a whole-hearted earnestness which will wipe out party lines.

I am sure Congress will respond to this popular demand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, can not the gentleman yield me more than that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have only five or six minutes left, and that time has been promised to other gentlemen.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Speaker will not put his eye on the watch too soon. I am going to read what should be under the hair of every Member of this House:

It is not right, as I see it, for a man to take the Government money for the discharge of the duties of an office and then neglect the duties of that office. I do not propose to neglect the duties of that office and go on the lecture platform and lecture for money.

That is language used by a respected Member of this House, one of the greatest presiding officers a democratic form of Government has ever had [applause], and each and every Member here ought to remember those plain, wholesome words.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most peculiar spectacle which we have witnessed here, one after another Member getting up and using the personal pronoun. There is none to be used. You took the oath to perform the duties pertaining to the office, not to evade them; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has been many times wrong, most influential as he is. If he had insisted upon his associates being as faithful in the performance of their duties as he himself has been, more of them would have been here; and let me say right here, and it is not flattery, because it is a fact—it is probably without parallel—that no man attends to his duty like the gentleman from Illinois [applause], and no man has the knowledge of the duties of his office compared with him, and still he is criminal when he winks his eye and allows his associates to evade the law. [Applause.] He allowed his lieutenant to go home for four months at a time to become a governor of a great State, and he is criminal when he allows his lieutenant to take a trip to Europe, with his knowledge and consent and without objection; and then he picks out an unsophisticated Member from some other State and holds him up as a picture to be scolded, as a picture to be scorned, as a picture to be made the subject of this resolution.

Our friends on the other side of the Chamber tell us that they are the brains; they tell us that they have the ability; they tell us they should have the care of all of the finance, all of the commerce, and all of the virtue there is in this country, and they set an example for us by neglecting their duties. They tell us that it is necessary. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is the person who told us that the presence of a minority prevented abuses. Where is he? What a picture! The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has not been here for two weeks, and the first voice from him this morning was the point of no quorum. [Laughter.] Well, he could not have made it many times in the last 9 weeks, when he has been here only 14 days, and those days afforded the only chance he has had of making it. He announces his presence with, "Mr. Speaker, no quorum." But the gentleman from Illinois, the leader, is to blame for this condition, for he acquiesced to his colleague's absence. [Applause.] Last October attention was called to absenteeism in this body by myself, nearly a year ago——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the House there are three gentlemen to whom I desire to yield, which will consume six minutes, and then I will move the previous question. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this, it seems, is the psychological moment for the introduction of a resolution to force Members back to their seats in order to keep a quorum. The last of the primaries in the Southern States is being held to-day, while in most of the Northern and Western States the primaries are yet to be held. Primaries in the State of Washington will be held September 8—exactly two weeks from to-day—and it takes a Washington Member almost a week to go to his State. Besides, as my colleague [Mr. FALCONER] has said, the members of the Washington delegation have not had even a chance to register, and are thus disfranchised. We have been here, are here, and are willing to stay; but nevertheless the resolution is unfair to those who have kept their shoulders at the wheel, and who were promised that other Members, now away, would be brought in to relieve those who have remained here all last summer, all last winter, and all this summer, helping to keep a bare quorum.

I have been here, Mr. Speaker, since the special session was called in April, 1913, have answered nearly all the roll calls, and yet it is being stated in some newspapers away out in my State that Mr JOHNSON of Washington is just getting back from Europe, where, as a matter of fact, he has never been. One paper explains by saying it must have been Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, whereas I happen to know he has been here in the House almost all summer.

I can not let this opportunity go by without referring to the efforts on the Democratic side of the aisle of the battle-scarred veteran from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] to keep a quorum on this floor. His efforts started almost a year ago, when he called attention to absenteeism. Although injured in an accident Saturday he is here to-day, all patched up, and helping to make and to keep a quorum on the floor.

It pleases me to refer to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON], who, having been away, grandly turned back some of his salary, without waiting for a resolution. For once I am with those gentlemen and for the resolution, in spite of its apparent unfairness to those who have kept on the job.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I am a northern Democrat. The primaries in our State come a week from to-day. I shall be as hard hit as any man in this House by this resolution. I had intended to go home to-day, being a candidate for the nomination for United States Senator. [Applause.] I have stayed here all through the summer up until to-day, when my own private interests for the last few weeks required me to be in New Hampshire; but I shall vote for this resolution. The only question before us is this: Do we need this resolution to-day to enforce a quorum to transact important public business growing out of the war? It is apparent that we do, and I do not think it is any time for partisan criticism or any time for sectional criticism. [Applause.]

I realize that a great many southern Members have been home during the primaries, but until very recently we have had Members enough here to make a quorum. It does no good to rake up the past. We need a quorum to-day and for the rest of the session. I am willing to vote for this resolution, and if I must go home I am willing to have my salary docked. I have had a little experience in turning back salary into the National Treasury. I was elected to this House at the last election, and I was also a member of the New Hampshire Legislature. We had several very important measures before the State legislature and the election of a United States Senator. I kept my seat in the State body until the 23d of April, when I came down here and was sworn in. On that same day I turned back into the Treasury of the United States $1,000 of salary. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I think it is the duty of every Democrat, whether northern or southern—that it is the duty of every Republican—to vote for any resolution that will compel the attendance of a quorum here and to remain here until the important legislation before us is passed. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, had I anticipated my colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] was to be recognized I think I should not have asked for time. I simply want to reiterate many of the things he said. I am a northern Democrat, and the Democratic national committeeman representing my party in the State. The Democratic primaries are to be held in the State of New Hampshire on the first day of September, and I have felt that as one of the leaders of my party I should be in New Hampshire. I am scheduled to speak on three or four occasions between now and that date. I do not know of anything that will afford me greater pleasure than to vote for this resolution, or greater regret than to send telegrams of regret canceling my engagements in New Hampshire if it passes. [Applause.] I believe it is the duty of every Democrat on the floor of this House, as has been well said by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] to stay here and hold ourselves in readiness for any emergency that might come about by the embroiled conditions of war abroad, and I am one of those who support this resolution and are willing to remain here and vote for any such emergency legislation that may arise, and give my loyal support, as I have from the very first day I came here, to an administration, the leader of which is that great statesman Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the law and ask the Clerk to read section 40 of the Revised Statutes, and then I will move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 40. The Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant at Arms of the House, respectively, shall deduct from the monthly payments of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he has been absent from the Senate or House, respectively, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] ask for a division.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will withhold that for half a minute, we will accomplish two things at one time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 141, noes 18.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present; evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 212, nays 27, answered "present" 8, not voting 184, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

REVOKING LEAVES OF ABSENCE, ETC.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is this: Does the passage of this resolution serve to revoke all previous excuses that have been granted on account of sickness?

Mr. MANN. It revokes all leaves of absence, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that is correct.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to granting any leaves of absence.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. AUSTIN, for a great number of weeks has been very seriously ill and wholly prevented from attending the sessions of the House. He is now at Jefferson Hospital——

Mr. MANN. At Philadelphia. I had a letter from him this morning.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. AUSTIN be excused from further attendance on the sessions of the House, on account of sickness.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I see no reason why leave of absence should be granted because Mr. AUSTIN is sick. It does not affect his salary. The man to determine whether sickness shall or shall not prevent the deduction of salary is the Sergeant at Arms.

All that the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. AUSTIN, has to do when he comes back here is to show to the Sergeant at Arms that he has been sick, and his salary will not be deducted, regardless of the action of the House.

Mr. MANN. I am informed that Mr. AUSTIN is quite ill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, after reading this resolution over again, that it does not revoke leaves of absence at all.

Mr. MANN. The way it was read by the Clerk it did.

The SPEAKER. It says:

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms is hereby directed—

Mr. MANN. The very first provision in it revokes all leaves of absence.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The Chair was mistaken about that. The Chair will state his recollection for the benefit of other Members, a great many of whom never had anything to do with it, that in the Fifty-third Congress, in the summer of 1894, this statute was enforced, and I paid $28 and some cents myself to go down in Virginia to make two speeches. But my recollection about it is that the Sergeant at Arms had some kind of a document down there that you had to sign, and you certified how many days you had been absent. If you did not make the certification you would have been here every day.

Mr. MANN. The honest men got penalized.

The SPEAKER. That may be perfectly true; and Speaker Reed sneered at the statute as "a police court regulation." That is the way he put it. Nevertheless it had the effect of keeping a quorum here.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, my recollection about the enforcement of that statute is that there was a certificate gotten up by the Sergeant at Arms which the Members of the House were required to sign, and most of them certified that they were present during the whole time. I think there were only about half a dozen of us—and I was included in that number—that suffered any deduction from our salary on account of it, and my recollection is that nobody suffered after the first month, and that they overlooked the certificate.

The SPEAKER. It was not enforced except at the end of the consideration of the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill.

Mr. MANN. I will make it my business to see that it is enforced until the 4th of March.

The SPEAKER. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. MANN. And I will see that no false statements are made downstairs, either.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLEMP requests leave of absence for Representative AUSTIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness. Representative AUSTIN is now confined in Jefferson Hospital, Philadelphia, on account of serious illness.

Mr. GLASS requests leave of absence for one week——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, let us have each one disposed of at a time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request in behalf of Mr. AUSTIN for leave of absence on account of sickness?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GLASS requests leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness.

(Signed) C. A. KORBLY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. MANN. Is Mr. GLASS ill?

The SPEAKER. He is. He has been ill for several weeks. He is threatened with nervous prostration. The last time he was here he came up to the Speaker's desk and explained the condition he was in and had been in for the last three or four weeks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KINDEL requests leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRISP requests leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STOUT requests leave of absence, for two days, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Is he ill?

Mr. EVANS. He is. I saw him this morning. I do not think he has missed a day in the House in the last year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MARTIN requests leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6266. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 181. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the contractor for building locks on Black River to proceed with the work without interruption to completion.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 30.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Washington Glick 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 shall be for the use and distribution by the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Kansas. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable plate of said statue to accompany the proceedings.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 30.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Washington Glick 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 shall be for use and distribution by the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Kansas. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable plate of said statue to accompany the proceedings—to the Committee on Printing.

S. 6266. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. J. Res. 181. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the contractor for building locks on Black Warrior River to proceed with the work without interruption to completion; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea, with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 136 with an amendment. The Clerk will report the bill with the amendment read into it which the gentleman from Missouri offers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections. This section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts."

SEC. 2. That in all merchant vessels of the United States of more than 100 tons gross, excepting those navigating rivers, harbors, bays, or sounds exclusively, the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen, oilers, and water tenders into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty successively for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel. The seamen shall not be shipped to work alternately in the fireroom and on deck, nor shall those shipped for deck duty be required to work in the fireroom, or vice versa; but these provisions shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, the whole or any part of the crew are needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo, or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy, or when in port or at sea from requiring the whole or any part of the crew to participate in the performance of fire, lifeboat, and other drills. While such vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or the following-named days: New Year's Day, the Fourth of July, Labor Day, Thanksgiving Day, and Christmas Day, but this shall not prevent the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage. And at all times while such vessel is in a safe harbor nine hours, inclusive of the anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section, the seaman shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and to receive the wages earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.

SEC. 3. That section 4529 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4529. The master or owner of any vessel making coasting voyages shall pay to every seaman his wages within two days after the termination of the agreement under which he was shipped, or at the time such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in case of vessels making foreign voyages, or from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, within 24 hours after the cargo has been discharged, or within four days after the seaman has been discharged, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall be entitled to be paid at the time of his discharge on account of wages a sum equal to one-third part of the balance due him. Every master or owner who refuses or neglects to make payment in the manner hereinbefore mentioned without sufficient cause shall pay to the seaman a sum equal to two days' pay for each and every day during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods, which sum shall be recoverable as wages in any claim made before the court; but this section shall not apply to masters or owners of any vessel the seamen of which are entitled to share in the profits of the cruise or voyage."

SEC. 4. That section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive on demand from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the wages which he shall have then earned at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended, and all stipulations in the contract to the contrary shall be void: Provided, Such a demand shall not be made oftener than once in five days. And when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due him, as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That notwithstanding any release signed by any seaman under section 4552 of the Revised Statutes any court having jurisdiction may upon good cause shown set aside such release and take such action as justice shall require: Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement."

SEC. 5. That section 4559 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4559. Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first and second officers or a majority of the crew of any vessel, while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome, thereupon in any of these or like cases the consul or a commercial agent who may discharge any of the duties of a consul shall cause to be appointed three persons of like qualifications with those described in section 4557, who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint and who shall proceed and be governed in all their proceedings as provided by said section."

SEC. 6. That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation," approved March 3, 1897, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on all merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of less than 100 tons register, every place appropriated to the crew of the vessel shall have a space of not less than 120 cubic feet and not less than 16 square feet, measured on the floor or deck of that place, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein, and each seaman shall have a separate berth, and not more than one berth shall be placed one above another; such place or lodging shall be securely constructed, properly lighted, drained, heated, and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvium of cargo or bilge water. And every such crew space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of the crew occupying said place in use during the voyage.

"Every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew, which shall conform to the requirements of this section, so far as they are applicable thereto, by providing sleeping room in the engine room of such steamboat, properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward, reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated.

"All merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act having more than 10 men on deck must have at least one light, clean, and properly ventilated washing place. There shall be provided at least one washing outfit for every 2 men of the watch. The washing place shall be properly heated. A separate washing place shall be provided for the fireroom and engine-room men, if their number exceed 10, which shall be large enough to accommodate at least one-sixth of them at the same time, and have hot and cold water supply and a sufficient number of wash basins, sinks, and shower baths.

"Any failure to comply with this section shall subject the owner or owners of such vessel to a penalty of not less than $50 nor more than $500."

SEC. 7. That section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4596. Whenever any seaman who has been lawfully engaged or any apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offenses, he shall be punished as follows:

"First. For desertion, by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

"Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel, or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two days' pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute.

"Third. For quitting the vessel without leave after her arrival at the port of her delivery and before she is placed in security, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than one month's pay.

"Fourth. For willful disobedience to any lawful command at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture from his wages of not more than four days' pay, or, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than one month.

"Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, as the Speaker well said a few minutes ago, this is one of the most important bills which has come before Congress for five years; and as there are only a handful of gentlemen present on the other side, apparently not a quorum, and as gentlemen of the House should be present to give attention to this bill, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota makes the point of no quorum present. It is of no use to go through the motions of counting, because there is no quorum here.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma). On this roll call there are 235 Members present—a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

"Sixth. For assaulting any master or mate, by imprisonment for not more than two years.

"Seventh. For willfully damaging the vessel, or embezzling or willfully damaging any of the stores or cargo, by forfeiture out of his wages of a sum equal in amount to the loss thereby sustained, and also, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than 12 months.

"Eighth. For any act of smuggling for which he is convicted and whereby loss or damage is occasioned to the master or owner, he shall be liable to pay such master or owner such a sum as is sufficient to reimburse the master or owner for such loss or damage, and the whole or any part of his wages may be retained in satisfaction or on account of such liability, and he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period of not more than 12 months."

SEC. 8. That section 4600 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4600. It shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination by every means in their power and, where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner. In all cases where seamen or officers are accused the consular officer shall inquire into the facts and proceed as provided in section 4583 of the Revised Statutes; and the officer discharging such seaman shall enter upon the crew list and shipping articles and official log the cause of such discharge and the particulars in which the cruel or unusual treatment consisted and subscribe his name thereto officially. He shall read the entry made in the official log to the master, and his reply thereto, if any, shall likewise be entered and subscribed in the same manner."

SEC. 9. That section 4611 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4611. Flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable, provided he has actual knowledge of the misdemeanor or compiaint thereof is made within three days after reaching port. Any failure on the part of such master to use due diligence to comply herewith, which failure shall result in the escape of such officer, shall render the master or owner of the vessel liable in damages for such flogging or corporal punishment to the person illegally punished by such officer."

SEC. 10. That section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended as regards the items of water and butter, so that in lieu of a daily requirement of 4 quarts of water there shall be a requirement of 5 quarts of water every day, and in lieu of a daily requriement of 1 ounce of butter there shall be a requirement of 2 ounces of butter every day.

SEC. 11. That section 24 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That section 10 of chapter 121 of the laws of 1884, as amended by section 3 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 10 (a). That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages, or to make any order, or note, or other evidence of indebtedness therefor to any other person, or to pay any person, for the shipment of seamen when payment is deducted or to be deducted from a seaman's wages. Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or allotment shall in no case except as herein provided absolve the vessel or the master or the owner thereof from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages. If any person shall demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment, he shall for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than six months or fined not more than $500.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, out of six gentlemen who spoke in favor of the Underwood resolution this morning there are none present——

Mr. COX. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska is out of order in discussing the Underwood resolution.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to raise the point of no quorum present. Undoubtedly those gentlemen would be present if they knew this important business was going on.

Mr. COX. The gentleman makes his statement entirely too broad.

Mr. SLOAN. I am willing to except the gentleman from my statement as to those who are absent.

Mr. COX. I have been here all the time. Of course the gentleman makes the point of no quorum properly, because it is absolutely true.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of no quorum while this bill is being read. It is a bill of the greatest public importance. We are all interested in having it passed, but when it is being read by the Clerk, even if the Members are present, they do not pay any attention to the reading.

Mr. MANN. They ought to. They take an oath that they will. Why should they not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agree with the gentleman entirely.

Mr. SLOAN. This is an important bill, and that is why the other five gentlemen who spoke this morning ought to be present here. That is why——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is that the gentleman from Nebraska makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-nine Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves a call of the House.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FARR. Division!

The House divided.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand there is a rule of this House that when the point of no quorum is made the Doorkeeper is ordered to lock the doors, that the Sergeant at Arms is to notify absentees, and that the Clerk will call the roll. I ask the Speaker to enforce the rule if there be one, which I understand is an ancient rule of this House, that the doors be locked and that Members be kept within the confines of the floor of this House until we can maintain and keep a quorum.

Mr. MANN. There is no such rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was putting the motion. The Chair will announce that the motion prevails.

Mr. MANN. What was the vote on the division?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote is ayes 83, noes none.

Mr. MANN. I just wanted the RECORD to show that there is not half a quorum here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote is ayes 83, noes none, and the motion is agreed to. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. As a matter of record, what was the number present, as counted by the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and thirty-nine Members present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-six Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. DICKINSON for leave of absence for 10 days, on account of sickness.

Mr. MANN. I think he may be able to attend the convention.

The SPEAKER. No; he is sick in bed.

Mr. MANN. Where is he?

The SPEAKER. He is at home.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I had a letter from Mr. DICKINSON within the last three or four days, in which he stated that he was dictating the letter lying in bed and that the doctor said he would have to remain in bed some time.

The SPEAKER. He went home because he was sick, although he was then able to travel, but he has grown worse since he got home.

Mr. MANN. I notice that two-thirds of the Missouri delegation are away from the House by reason of sickness. There are 6 out of 15 here now.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, there are more than 6.

Mr. MANN. Who are they?

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Illinois has no right to catechize me.

Mr. MANN. I can name those who are here; I have just been over the list.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. CHURCH for leave of absence for 10 days on account of sickness.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I make the point of order that under the law the gentleman can be excused by assigning as a reason sickness.

Mr. RAKER. Let the facts in this case be stated. Mr. CHURCH has had a doctor for three or four days——

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California may make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. He is making the explanation.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. But the gentleman was proceeding out of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New Jersey is always quite attentive to his duties.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I am sure I am grateful to the gentleman from Illinois, and those of us who see him working so untiringly for his constituents no longer marvel at his brilliant successes at the polls.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should not leave the House even to be sheriff of Hudson County.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, as I was saying in regard to Mr. CHURCH, three or four days ago he came into my office—he has a room just opposite from mine. He was sick and unable to do his work, and had a physician, and was going to take his family and go home. I told him that he had better stay here on the job. I advised him to go to some local place, where he could get a little rest and recreation, and he has done so and will remain.

Mr. MANN. He ought to take the physician's advice.

Mr. RAKER. He took a pretty good one when he took mine.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right to object for the purpose of saying that a short time ago several Members from Missouri presented with great éclat on the floor of the House a statement that they had asked the President to keep Congress in session and that they would always be found here at his right hand supporting him. To-day there are 6 out of 15 in the House.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Merely that the gentleman may be accurate in his remarks, I want to advise him that no Member of the Missouri delegation presented any statement of that kind in the House.

Mr. MANN. It was presented in the House, although it was not exactly in the language that I used, but it was that in substance. I do not know whether it was presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], but some other rank Member from Missouri presented it, and they have now gone home.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Illinois knows that it was not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] that presented it, and he is inaccurate about the number of Missourians that are here present to-day.

Mr. MANN. Six out of fifteen are here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VARE requests leave of absence for Mr. GRIEST, on account of sickness.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that he is actually sick?

Mr. VARE. He has been sick for two months.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, is there any system of determining what constitutes illness, or of obtaining any line on this subject?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question. The Chair thinks that when a man is in bed with the attendance of a doctor he is sick.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to state in the interest of truth, in regard to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois in relation to the absence of Missourians, that, as stated by several Members, Mr. DICKINSON is at home sick in bed. That is the information we all have. I think it is fair to say also that Mr. RUBEY was called home by a telegram announcing the sudden death of his father; that Mr. HENSLEY has gone home to submit to an operation which not only the surgeons here but there told him he must submit to in the near future; that Mr. RUSSELL was excused by the House to go home and attend a convention, and will return in a day or two. I am sure that it is generally known that Judge SHACKLEFORD has not been well for some time. So the criticism submitted by the gentleman from Illinois in regard to the Missouri delegation is entirely gratuitous and not warranted by the facts.

Mr. MANN. I did not state anything but that was an absolute fact. What is the use of saying that it is "entirely gratuitous"?

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Illinois embellished the facts a little bit.

Mr. MANN. I did not.

Mr. HAMLIN. And intended that an inference should be drawn that certain Members had made certain statements, and then immediately after the primaries left for home.

Mr. MANN. I did not say when they left, and I made no statement of that sort, and I do not think the gentleman should say that the statements were not warranted by the facts.

Mr. HAMLIN. I did not intend that the statement of the gentleman should go unchallenged.

The SPEAKER. It does not make a particle of difference what the Missouri delegation said to the President or the President to the Missouri delegation.

Mr. MANN. I guess that is true. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. It is true. It has nothing to do with the proceedings of this House, and it shall not be turned into a hippodrome. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the House to excuse me to-day and from further attendance upon the House, indefinitely. I am here at considerable risk to myself, and I have come now two days in order to try to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence on account of ill health. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk continued and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

"'(b) That it shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages he may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or children.

"'(c) That no allotment shall be valid unless in writing and signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner. It shall be the duty of the said commissioner to examine such allotments and the parties to them and enforce compliance with the law. All stipulations for the allotment of any part of the wages of a seaman during his absence which are made at the commencement of the voyage shall be inserted in the agreement and shall state the amounts and times of the payments to be made and the persons to whom the payments are to be made.

"'(d) That no allotment except as provided for in this section shall be lawful. Any person who shall falsely claim to be such relation, as above described, of a seaman under this section shall for every such offense be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court.

"'(e) That this section shall apply as well to foreign vessels while in waters of the United States as to vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for similar violation.

"'The master, owner, consignee, or agent of any vessel of the United States, or of any foreign vessel seeking clearance from a port of the United States, shall present his shipping articles at the office of clearance, and no clearance shall be granted any such vessel unless the provisions of this section have been complied with: Provided, That treaties in force between the United States and foreign nations do not conflict herewith.

"'(f) That under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce the Commissioner of Navigation shall make regulations to carry out this section.'"

SEC. 12. That no wages due or accruing to any seaman or apprentice employed on a vessel of the United States shall be subject to attachment or arrestment from any court, and every payment of wages to a seaman or apprentice shall be valid in law, notwithstanding any previous sale or assignment of wages or of any attachment, encumbrance, or arrestment thereon; and no assignment or sale of wages or of salvage made prior to the accruing thereof shall bind the party making the same, except such allotments as are authorized by this title. This section shall apply to fishermen employed on fishing vessels as well as to seamen: Provided, That nothing contained in this or any preceding section shall interfere with the order by any court regarding the payment by any seaman of any part of his wages for the support and maintenance of his wife and minor children. Section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

SEC. 13. That no vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating rivers exclusively and the smaller inland lakes where the line of travel is at no point more than 3½ miles from land, and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices, are of a rating not less than able seaman. Every person shall be rated an able seaman, and qualified for service as such on the seas, who is 19 years of age or upward and has had at least three years' service on deck on a vessel or vessels to which this section applies; and every person shall be rated an able seaman, and qualified to serve as such on the Great Lakes and other lakes, and on the bays or sounds who is 19 years old or upward and has had at least 24 months' service on deck on such vessel or vessels: Provided, That upon examination under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce as to eyesight, hearing, and physical condition he is found to be competent: And provided further, That upon examination under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce as to eyesight, hearing, physical condition, and knowledge of the duties of seamanship man found competent may be rated as able seaman after having served on deck 12 months at sea; but seamen examined and rated able seamen under this proviso shall not in any case compose more than one-fourth of the number of able seamen required by this section to be shipped or employed upon any vessel.

Any person may make application to any board of local inspectors for a certificate of service as able seaman, and upon proof being made to said board by affidavit and examination, under rules approved by the Secretary of Commerce, showing the nationality and age of the applicant and the vessel or vessels on which he has had service and that he is entitled to such certificate under the provisions of this section, the board of local inspectors shall issue to said applicant a certificate of service, which shall be retained by him and be accepted as prima facie evidence of his rating as an able seaman.

Each board of local inspectors shall keep a complete record of all certificates of service issued by them and to whom issued and shall keep on file the affidavits upon which said certificates are issued.

The collector of customs may, upon his own motion, and shall, upon the sworn information of any reputable citizen of the United States setting forth that this section is not being complied with, cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to be made to determine the fact; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel failing to comply with the provisions of this section: Provided, That the collector of customs shall not be required to cause such muster of the crew to be made unless said sworn information has been filed with him for at least six hours before the vessel departs, or is scheduled to depart: Provided further, That any person that shall knowingly make a false affidavit for such purpose shall be deemed guilty of perjury and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, within the discretion of the court. Any violation of any provision of this section by the owner, master, or officer in charge of the vessel shall subject the owner of such vessel to a penalty of not less than $100 and not more than $500: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to prevent the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, from making rules and regulations authorized by law as to vessels excluded from the operation of this section.

SEC. 14. That section 4488 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding thereto the following: "The powers bestowed by this section upon the board of supervising inspectors in respect of lifeboat, floats, rafts, life preservers, and other life-saving appliances and equipment, and the further requirements herein as to davits, embarkation of passengers in lifeboats and rafts, and the manning of lifeboats and rafts, and the musters and drills of the crews, on steamers navigating the ocean, or any lake, bay, or sound of the United States, on and after July 1, 1915, shall be subject to the provisions, limitations, and minimum requirements of the regulations herein set forth, and all such vessels shall thereafter be required to comply in all respects therewith."

REGULATIONS.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES.

Standard types of boats.

The standard types of boats classified as follows:

Class.	Section.	Type.
I (Entirely rigid sides.)	A Open.	Internal buoyancy only.
	B Open.	Internal and external buoyancy.
	C Pontoon.	Well deck; fixed water-tight bulwarks.
II (Partially collapsible sides.)	A Open.	Upper part of sides collapsible.
	B Pontoon.	Well deck; collapsible water-tight bulwarks.
	C Pontoon.	Flush deck; collapsible water-tight bulwarks.

STRENGTH OF BOATS.

Each boat must be of sufficient strength to enable it to be safely lowered into the water when loaded with its full complement of persons and equipment.

ALTERNATIVE TYPES OF BOATS AND RAFTS.

Any type of boat may be accepted as equivalent to a boat of one of the prescribed classes and any type of raft as equivalent to an approved pontoon raft, if the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is satisfied by suitable trials that it is as effective as the standard types of the class in question, or as the approved type of pontoon raft, as the case may be.

Motor boats may be accepted if they comply with the requirements laid down for boats of the first class, but only to a limited number, which number shall be determined by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

No boat may be approved the buoyancy of which depends upon the previous adjustment of one of the principal parts of the hull or which has not a cubic capacity of at least 125 cubic feet.

BOATS OF THE FIRST CLASS.

The standard types of boats of the first class must satisfy the following conditions:

1A.—OPEN BOATS WITH INTERNAL BUOYANCY ONLY.

The buoyancy of a wooden boat of this type shall be provided by water-tight air cases, the total volume of which shall be at least equal to one-tenth of the cubic capacity of the boat.

The buoyancy of a metal boat of this type shall not be less than that required above for a wooden boat of the same cubic capacity, the volume of water-tight air cases being increased accordingly.

1B.—OPEN BOATS WITH INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL BUOYANCY.

The internal buoyancy of a wooden boat of this type shall be provided by water-tight air cases, the total volume of which is at least equal to 7½ per cent of the cubic capacity of the boat.

The external buoyancy may be of cork or of any other equally efficient material, but such buoyancy shall not be secured by the use of rushes, cork shavings, loose granulated cork, or any other loose granulated substance, or by any means dependent upon inflation by air.

If the buoyancy is of cork, its volume, for a wooden boat, shall not be less than thirty-three thousandths of the cubic capacity of the boat; if of any material other than cork, its volume and distribution shall be such that the buoyancy and stability of the boat are not less than that of a similar boat provided with buoyancy of cork.

The buoyancy of a metal boat shall be not less than that required above for a wooden boat of the same cubic capacity, the volume of the air cases and external buoyancy being increased accordingly.

1C.—PONTOON BOATS, IN WHICH PERSONS CAN NOT BE ACCOMMODATED BELOW THE DECK, HAVING A WELL DECK AND FIXED WATER-TIGHT BULWARKS.

The area of the well deck of a boat of this type shall be at least 30 per cent of the total deck area. The height of the well deck above the water line at all points shall be at least equal to one-half per cent of the length of the boat, this height being increased to 1½ per cent of the length of the boat at the ends of the well.

The freeboard of a boat of this type shall be such as to provide for a reserve buoyancy of at least 35 per cent.

BOATS OF THE SECOND CLASS.

The standard types of boats of the second class must satisfy the following conditions:

2A.—OPEN BOATS HAVING THE UPPER PART OF THE SIDES COLLAPSIBLE.

A boat of this type shall be fitted both with water-tight air cases and with external buoyancy, the volume of which, for each person which the boat is able to accommodate, shall be at least equal to the following amounts: Air cases, 1.5 cubic feet; external buoyancy (if of cork), two-tenths cubic foot.

The minimum freeboard of boats of this type is fixed in relation to their length; it is measured vertically to the top of the solid hull at the side amidships, from the water level when the boat is loaded.

The freeboard in fresh water shall not be less than the following amounts:

Length of the boat.	Minimum freeboard.
Feet.	Inches.
30	10

The freeboard of boats of intermediate lengths is to be found by interpolation.

2B.—PONTOON BOATS HAVING A WELL DECK AND COLLAPSIBLE BULWARKS.

All the conditions laid down for boats of type 1C are to be applied to boats of this type, which differ from those of type 1C only in regard to the bulwarks.

2C.—PONTOON BOATS, IN WHICH THE PERSONS CAN NOT BE ACCOMMODATED BELOW DECK, HAVING A FLUSH DECK AND COLLAPSIBLE BULWARKS.

The minimum freeboard of boats of this type is independent of their lengths and depends only upon their depth. The depth of the boat is to be measured vertically from the underside of the garboard strake to the top of the deck on the side amidships, and the freeboard is to be measured from the top of the deck at the side amidships to the water level when the boat is loaded.

The freeboard in fresh water shall not be less than the following amounts, which are applicable without correction to boats having a mean sheer equal to 3 per cent of their length:

Depth of boat.	Minimum freeboard.
Inches.	Inches.
12	2½
18	3½
20	5½
30	6½

For intermediate depths the freeboard is obtained by interpolation.

If the sheer is less than the standard sheer defined above, the minimum freeboard is obtained by adding to the figures in the table one-seventh of the difference between the standard sheer and the actual mean sheer measured at the stem and sternpost. No deduction is to be made from the freeboard on account of the sheer being greater than the standard sheer or on account of the camber of the deck.

MOTOR BOATS.

When motor boats are accepted, the volume of internal buoyancy and, when fitted, the external buoyancy must be fixed, having regard to the difference between the weight of the motor and its accessories and the weight of the additional persons which the boat could accommodate if the motor and its accessories were removed.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR CLEARING PONTOON LIFEBOATS OF WATER.

All pontoon lifeboats shall be fitted with efficient means for quickly clearing the deck of water. The orifices for this purpose shall be such that the water can not enter the boat through them when they are intermittingly submerged. The number and size of the orifices shall be determined for each type of boat by a special test.

For the purpose of this test the pontoon boat shall be loaded with a weight of iron equal to that of its complement of persons and equipment.

In the case of a boat 28 feet in length 2 tons of water shall be cleared from the boat in a time not exceeding the following: Type 1C, 60 seconds; type 2B, 60 seconds; type 2C, 20 seconds.

In the case of a boat having a length greater or less than 28 feet the weight of water to be cleared in the same time shall be, for each type, directly proportional to the length of the boat.

CONSTRUCTION OF BOATS.

Open lifeboats of the first class (types 1A and 1B) must have a mean sheer at least equal to 4 per cent of their length.

The air cases of open boats of the first class shall be placed along the sides of the boat; they may also be placed at the ends of the boat, but not in the bottom of the boat.

Pontoon lifeboats may be built of wood or metal. If constructed of wood, they shall have the bottom and deck made of two thicknesses with textile material between; if of metal, they shall be divided into water-tight compartments, with means of access to each compartment.

All boats shall be fitted for the use of a steering oar.

PONTOON RAFTS.

No type of pontoon raft may be approved unless it satisfies the following conditions:

First. It should be reversible and fitted with bulwarks of wood, canvas, or other suitable material on both sides. These bulwarks may be collapsible.

Second. It should be of such size, strength, and weight that it can be handled without mechanical appliances, and, if necessary, be thrown from the vessel's deck.

Third. It should have not less than 3 cubic feet of air cases or equivalent buoyancy for each person whom it can accommodate.

Fourth. It should have a deck area of not less than 4 square feet for each person whom it can accommodate, and the platform should not be less than 6 inches above the water level when the raft is loaded.

Fifth. The air cases or equivalent buoyancy should be placed as near as possible to the sides of the raft.

CAPACITY OF BOATS AND PONTOON RAFTS.

First. The number of persons which a boat of one of the standard types or a pontoon raft can accommodate is equal to the greatest whole number obtained by dividing the capacity in cubic feet, or the surface in square feet, of the boat or of the raft by the standard unit of capacity, or unit of surface (according to circumstances), defined below for each type.

Second. The cubic capacity in feet of a boat in which the number of persons is determined by the surface shall be assumed to be ten times the number of persons which it is authorized to carry.

Third. The standard units of capacity and surface are as follows:

Units of capacity, open boats, type 1A, 10 cubic feet; open boats, type 1B, 9 cubic feet.

Unit of surface, open boats, type 2A, 3½ square feet; pontoon boats, type 2C, 3½ square feet; pontoon boats, type 1C, 3½ square feet; pontoon boats, type 2B, 3½ square feet.

Fourth. The board of supervising inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, may accept, in place of 3½, a smaller divisor if it is satisfied after trial that the number of persons for whom there is seating accommodations in the pontoon boat in question is greater than the number obtained by applying the above divisor, provided always that the divisor adopted in place of 3½ may never be less than 3.

CAPACITY LIMITS.

Pontoon boats and pontoon rafts shall never be marked with a number of persons greater than that obtained in the manner specified in this section.

This number shall be reduced—

First. When it is greater than the number of persons for which there is proper seating accommodation, the latter number being determined in such a way that the persons when seated do not interfere in any way with the use of the oars.

Second. When, in the case of boats other than those of the first two sections of the first class, the freeboard, when the boat is fully loaded, is less than the freeboard laid down for each type respectively. In such circumstances the number shall be reduced until the freeboard when the boat is fully loaded is at least equal to the standard freeboard laid down above.

In boats of types 1C and 2B the raised part of the deck at the sides may be regarded as affording seating accommodation.

EQUIVALENTS FOR AND WEIGHT OF THE PERSONS.

In tests for determining the number of persons which a boat or pontoon raft can accommodate each person shall be assumed to be an adult person wearing a life jacket.

In verifications of freeboard the pontoon boats shall be loaded with a weight of at least 165 pounds for each adult person that the pontoon boat is authoried to carry.

In all cases two children under 12 years of age shall be reckoned as one person.

CUBIC CAPACITY OF OPEN BOATS OF THE FIRST CLASS.

First. The cubic capacity of an open boat of type 1A or 1B shall be determined by Stirling's (Simpson's) rule or by any other method, approved by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, giving the same degree of accuracy. The capacity of a square-sterned boat shall be calculated as if the boat had a pointed stern.

Second. For example, the capacity in cubic feet of a boat, calculated by the aid of Stirling's rule, may be considered as given by the following formula:

$$\text{Capacity} = \frac{l}{12}(4A + 2B + 4C)$$

l being the length of the boat in meters (or feet) from the inside of the planking or plating at the stem to the corresponding point at the stern post; in the case of a boat with a square stern, the length is measured to the inside of the transom.

A, B, C denote, respectively, the areas of the cross sections at the quarter length forward, amidships, and the quarter length aft, which correspond to the three points obtained by dividing l into four equal parts. (The areas corresponding to the two ends of the boat are considered negligible.)

The areas A, B, C shall be deemed to be given in square feet by the successive application of the following formula to each of the three cross sections:

$$\text{Area} = \frac{h}{12}(a + 4b + 2c + 4d + e)$$

h being the depth measured in meters (or in feet) inside the planking or plating from the keel to the level of the gunwale, or, in certain cases, to a lower level, as determined hereafter.

a, b, c, d, e denote the horizontal breadths of the boat measured in feet at the upper and lower points of the depth and at the three points obtained by dividing h into four equal parts (a and e being the breadths at the extreme points, and c at the middle point, of h).

Third. If the sheer of the gunwale, measured at the two points situated at a quarter of the length of the boat from the ends, exceeds 1 per cent of the length of the boat, the depth employed in calculating the area of the cross sections A or C shall be deemed to be the depth amidships plus 1 per cent of the length of the boat.

Fourth. If the depth of the boat amidships exceeds 45 per cent of the breadth, the depth employed in calculating the area of the midship across section B shall be deemed to be equal to 45 per cent of the breadth; and the depth employed in calculating the areas of the quarter-length sections A and C is obtained by increasing this last figure by an amount equal to 1 per cent of the length of the boat: Provided, That in no case shall the depths employed in the calculation exceed the actual depths at these points.

Fifth. If the depth of the boat is greater than 4 feet, the number of persons given by the application of this rule shall be reduced in proportion to the ratio of 4 feet to the actual depth, until the boat has been satisfactorily tested afloat with that number of persons on board all wearing life jackets.

Sixth. The Board of Supervising Inspectors shall impose, by suitable formulæ, a limit for the number of persons allowed in boats with very fine ends and in boats very full in form.

Seventh. The Board of Supervising Inspectors may by regulation assign to a boat a capacity equal to the product of the length, the breadth, and the depth multiplied by six-tenths if it is evident that this formula does not give a greater capacity than that obtained by the above method. The dimensions shall then be measured in the following manner:

Length. From the intersection of the outside of the planking with the stem to the corresponding point at the sternpost or, in the case of a square-sterned boat, to the afterside of the transom.

Breadth. From the ontside of the planking at the point where the breadth of the boat is greatest.

Depth. Amidships inside the planking from the keel to the level of the gunwale, but the depth used in caculating the cubic capacity may not in any case exceed 45 per cent of the breadth.

In all cases the vessel owner has the right to require that the cubic capacity of the boat shall be determined by exact measurement.

Eighth. The cubic capacity of a motor boat is obtained from the gross capacity by deducting a volume equal to that occupied by the motor and its accessories.

DECK AREA OF PONTOON BOATS AND OPEN BOATS OF THE SECOND CLASS.

First. The area of the deck of a pontoon boat of type 1C, 2B, or 2C shall be determined by the method indicated below or by any other method giving the same degree of accuracy. The same rule is to be applied in determining the area within the fixed bulwarks of a boat of type 2A.

Second. For example, the surface in square feet of a boat may be deemed to be given by the following formula:

$$\text{Area} = \frac{l}{12}(2a + 1.2b + 4c + 1.5d + 2e),$$

l being the length in feet from the intersection of the outside of the planking with the stem to the corresponding point at the sternpost.

a, b, c, d, e, denote the horizontal breadths in feet outside the planking at the points obtained by dividing l into four equal parts and subdividing the foremost and aftermost parts into two equal parts (a and e being the breadths at the extreme subdivisions, c at the middle point of the length, and b and d at the intermediate points).

MARKING OF BOATS AND PONTOON RAFTS.

The dimensions of the boat and the number of persons which it is authorized to carry shall be marked on it in clear, permanent characters, according to regulations by the board of supervising inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce. These marks shall be specifically approved by the officers appointed to inspect the ship.

Pontoon rafts shall be marked with the number of persons in the same manner.

EQUIPMENT OF BOATS AND PONTOON RAFTS.

First. The normal equipment of every boat shall consist of—

(a) A single banked complement of oars and two spare oars; one set and a half of thole pins or crutches; a boat hook.

(b) Two plugs for each plug hole (plugs are not required when proper automatic valves are fitted); a baller and a galvanized-iron bucket.

(c) A tiller or yoke and yoke lines.

(d) Two hatchets.

(e) A lamp filled with oil and trimmed.

(f) A mast or masts with one good sail at least, and proper gear for each. (This does not apply to motor lifeboats.)

(g) A suitable compass.

Pontoon lifeboats will have no plug hole, but shall be provided with at least two bilge pumps.

In the case of a steamer which carries passengers in the North Atlantic, all the boats need not be equipped with masts, sails, and compasses, if the ship is provided with a radiotelegraph installation.

Second. The normal equipment of every approved pontoon raft shall consist of—

(a) Four oars.

(b) Five rowlocks.

(c) A self-igniting life-buoy light.

Third. In addition, every boat and every pontoon raft shall be equipped with—

(a) A life line beckoted round the outside.

(b) A sea anchor.

(c) A painter.

(d) A vessel containing 1 gallon of vegetable or animal oil. The vessel shall be so constructed that the oil can be easily distributed on the water, and so arranged that it can be attached to the sea anchor.

(e) A water-tight receptacle containing 2 pounds avoirdupois of provisions for each person.

(f) A water-tight receptacle containing 1 quart for each person.

(g) A number of self-igniting "red lights" and a water-tight box of matches.

Fourth. All loose equipment must be securely attached to the boat or pontoon raft to which it belongs.

STOWAGE OF BOATS—NUMBER OF DAVITS.

The minimum number of sets of davits is fixed in relation to the length of the vessel, provided that a number of sets of davits greater than the number of boats necessary for the accommodation of all the persons on board may not be required.

HANDLING OF THE BOATS AND RAFTS.

All the boats and rafts must be stowed in such a way that they can be launched in the shortest possible time, and that, even under unfavorable conditions of list and trim from the point of view of the handling of the boats and rafts, it may be possible to embark in them as large a number of persons as possible.

The arrangements must be such that it may be possible to launch on either side of the vessel as large a number of boats and rafts as possible.

STRENGTH AND OPERATION OF THE DAVITS.

The davits shall be of such strength that the boats can be lowered with their full complement of persons and equipment, the vessel being assumed to have a list of 15 degrees.

The davits must be fitted with a gear of sufficient power to insure that the boat can be turned out against the maximum list under which the lowering of the boats is possible on the vessel in question.

OTHER APPLIANCES EQUIVALENT TO DAVITS.

Any appliance may be accepted in lieu of davits or sets of davits if the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is satisfied after proper trials that the appliance in question is as effective as davits for placing the boats in the water.

DAVITS.

Each set of davits shall have a boat of the first class attached to it, provided that the number of open boats of the first class attached to davits shall not be less than the minimum number fixed by the table which follows.

If it is neither practicable nor reasonable to place on a vessel the minimum number of sets of davits required by the rules, the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, may authorize a smaller number of sets of davits to be fitted, provided always that this number shall never be less than the minimum number of open boats of the first class required by the rules.

If a large proportion of the persons on board are accommodated in boats whose length is greater than 50 feet, a further reduction in the number of sets of davits may be allowed exceptionally, if the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is satisfied that the arrangements are in all respects satisfactory.

In all cases in which a reduction in the minimum number of sets of davits or other equivalent appliances required by the rules is allowed the owner of the vessel in question shall be required to prove, by a test made in the presence of an officer designated by the Supervising Inspector General, that all the boats can be efficiently launched in a minimum time

The conditions of this test shall be as follows:

First. The vessel is to be upright and in smooth water.

Second. The time is the time required from the beginning of the removal of the boat covers, or any other operation necessary to prepare the boats for lowering, until the last boat or pontoon raft is afloat.

Third. The number of men employed in the whole operation must not exceed the total number of boat hands that will be carried on the vessel under normal service conditions.

Fourth. Each boat when being lowered must have on board at least two men and its full equipment as required by the rules.

The time allowed for putting all the boats into the water shall be fixed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

MINIMUM NUMBER OF DAVITS AND OF OPEN BOATS OF THE FIRST CLASS—MINIMUM BOAT CAPACITY.

The following table fixes, according to the length of the vessel—

(A) The minimum number of sets of davits to be provided, to each of which must be attached a boat of the first class in accordance with this section.

(B) The minimum total number of open boats of the first class, which must be attached to davits, in accordance with this section.

(C) The minimum boat capacity required, including the boats attached to davits and the additional boats, in accordance with this section.

Registered length of the ship (feet).	(A) Minimum number of sets of davits.	(B) Minimum number of open boats of the first class.	(C) Minimum capacity of lifeboats.

When the length of the vessel exceeds 1,030 feet, the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall determine the minimum number of sets of davits and of open boats of the first class for that vessel.

EMBARKATION OF THE PASSENGERS IN THE LIFEBOATS AND RAFTS.

Suitable arrangements shall be made for embarking the passengers in the boats, in accord with regulations by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

In vessels which carry rafts there shall be a number of rope ladders always available for use in embarking the persons on to the rafts.

The number and arrangement of the boats, and (where they are allowed) of the pontoon rafts, on a vessel depends upon the total number of persons which the vessel is intended to carry: Provided, That there shall not be required on any voyage a total capacity in boats, and (where they are allowed) pontoon rafts, greater than that necessary to accommodate all the persons on board.

At no moment of its voyage shall any passenger steam vessel of the United States on ocean routes more than 20 nautical miles offshore have on board a total number of persons greater than that for whom accommodation is provided in the lifeboats and pontoon life rafts on board.

If the lifeboats attached to davits do not provide sufficient accommodation for all persons on board, additional lifeboats of one of the standard types shall be provided. This addition shall bring the total capacity of the boats on the vessel at least up to the greater of the two following amounts:

(a) The minimum capacity required by these regulations;

(b) A capacity sufficient to accommodate 75 per cent of the persons on board.

The remainder of the accommodation required shall be provided, under regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce, either in boats of class 1 or class 2, or in pontoon rafts of an approved type.

At no moment of its voyage shall any passenger steam vessel of the United States on ocean routes less than 20 nautical miles offshore have on board a total number of persons greater than that for whom accommodation is provided in the lifeboats and pontoon rafts on board. The accommodation provided in lifeboats shall in every case be sufficient to accommodate at least 75 per cent of the persons on board. The number and type of such lifeboats and life rafts shall be determined by regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That during the interval from May 15 to September 15, inclusive, any passenger steam vessel of the United States, on ocean routes less than 20 nautical miles offshore, shall be required to carry accommodation for not less than 70 per cent of the total number of persons on board in lifeboats and pontoon life rafts, of which accommodation not less than 50 per cent shall be in lifeboats and 50 per cent may be in collapsible boats or rafts, under regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

At no moment of its voyage may any ocean-cargo steam vessel of the United States have on board a total number of persons greater than that for whom accommodation is provided in the lifeboats on board. The number and types of such boats shall be determined by regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

At no moment of its voyage may any passenger steam vessel of the United States on the Great Lakes, on routes more than 3 miles offshore, except over waters whose depth is not sufficient to submerge all the decks of the vessel, have on board a total number of persons, including passengers and crew, greater than that for whom accommodation is provided in the lifeboats and pontoon life rafts on board. The accommodation provided in lifeboats shall in every case be sufficient to accommodate at least 75 per cent of the persons on board. The number and types of such lifeboats and life rafts shall be determined by regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That during the interval from May 15 to September 15, inclusive, any such steamer shall be required to carry accommodation for not less than 50 per cent of persons on board in lifeboats and pontoon life rafts, of which accommodation not less than two-fifths shall be in lifeboats and three-fifths may be in collapsible boats or rafts, under regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided further, That all passenger steam vessels of the United States, the keels of which are laid after the 1st of July, 1915, for service on ocean routes and on the Great Lakes, on routes more than 3 miles offshore, shall be built to carry, and shall carry, enough lifeboats and life rafts to accommodate all persons on board, including passengers and crew: And provided further, That not more than 25 per cent of such equipment may be in pontoon life rafts or collapsible lifeboats.

At no moment of its voyage may any cargo steam vessel of the United States on the Great Lakes have on board a total number of persons greater than that for whom accommodation is provided in the lifeboats on board. The number and types of such boats shall be determined by regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

The number, types, and capacity of lifeboats and life rafts, together with the proportion of such accommodation to the number of persons on board which shall be carried on steam vessels on the Great Lakes, on routes 3 miles or less offshore or over waters whose depth is not sufficient to submerge all the decks of the vessels, and on all other lakes, and on rivers, bays, and sounds, shall be determined by regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

All regulations by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce, authorized by this act, shall be transmitted to Congress as soon as practicable after they are made.

The Secretary of Commerce is authorized in specific cases to exempt existing vessels from the requirements of this section that the davits shall be of such strength and shall be fitted with a gear of sufficient power to insure that the boats can be lowered with their full complement of persons and equipment, the vessel being assumed to have a list of 15 degrees, where their strict application would not be practicable or reasonable.

CERTIFICATED LIFEBOAT MEN—MANNING OF THE BOATS.

There shall be for each boat or raft a number of lifeboat men at least equal to that specified as follows: If the boat or raft carries less than 61 persons, the minimum number of certificated lifeboat men shall be 3; if the boat or raft carries from 61 to 85 persons, the minimum number of certificated lifeboat men shall be 4; if the boat or raft carries from 86 to 110 persons, the minimum number of certificated lifeboat men shall be 5; if the boat or raft carries from 111 to 160 persons, the minimum number of certificated lifeboat men shall be 6; if the boat or raft carries from 161 to 210 persons, the minimum number of certificated lifeboat men shall be 7; and, thereafter, 1 additional certificated lifeboat man for each additional 50 persons.

The allocation of the certificated lifeboat men to each boat and raft remains within the discretion of the master, according to the circumstances.

By "certificated lifeboat man" is meant any member of the crew who holds a certificate of efficiency issued under the authority of the Secretary of Commerce, who is hereby directed to provide for the issue of such certificates.

In order to obtain the special lifeboat man's certificate the applicant must prove to the satisfaction of an officer designated by the Secretary of Commerce that he has been trained in all the operations connected with launching lifeboats and the use of oars; that he is acquainted with the practical handling of the boats themselves; and, further, that he is capable of understanding and answering the orders relative to lifeboat service.

Section 4463 of the Revised Statutes as amended is hereby amended by adding the words "including certificated lifeboat men, separately stated," to the word "crew" wherever it occurs.

MANNING OF BOATS.

A licensed officer or able seaman shall be placed in charge of each boat or pontoon raft; he shall have a list of its lifeboat men, and other members of its crew which shall be sufficient for her safe management, and shall see that the men placed under his orders are acquainted with their several duties and stations.

A man capable of working the motor shall be assigned to each motor boat.

The duty of seeing that the boats, pontoon rafts, and other lifesaving appliances are at all times ready for use shall be assigned to one or more officers.

MUSTER ROLL AND DRILLS.

Special duties for the event of an emergency shall be allotted to each member of the crew.

The muster list shows all these special duties, and indicates, in particular, the station to which each man must go, and the duties that he has to perform.

Before the vessel sails the muster list shall be drawn up and exhibited, and the proper authority, to be designated by the Secretary of Commerce, shall be satisfied that the muster list has been prepared for the vessel. It shall be posted in several parts of the vessel, and in particular in the crew's quarters.

MUSTER LIST.

The muster list shall assign duties to the different members of the crew in connection with—

(a) The closing of the water-tight doors, valves, etc.
(b) The equipment of the boats and rafts generally.
(c) The launching of the boats attached to davits.
(d) The general preparation of the other boats and the pontoon rafts.
(e) The muster of the passengers.
(f) The extinction of fire.

The muster list shall assign to the members of the stewards' department their several duties in relation to the passengers at a time of emergency. These duties shall include—

(a) Warning the passengers.
(b) Seeing that they are dressed and have put on their life jackets in a proper manner.
(c) Assembling the passengers.
(d) Keeping order in the passages and on the stairways, and, generally, controlling the movements of the passengers.

The muster list shall specify definite alarm signals for calling all the crew to the boat and fire stations and shall give full particulars of these signals.

MUSTERS AND DRILLS.

Musters of the crews at their boat and fire stations, followed by boat and fire drills, respectively, shall be held at least once a week, either in port or at sea. An entry shall be made in the official log book of these drills, or of the reasons why they could not be held.

Different groups of boats shall be used in turn at successive boat drills. The drills and inspections shall be so arranged that the crew thoroughly understand and are practiced in the duties they have to perform, and that all the boats and pontoon rafts on the ships with the gear appertaining to them are always ready for immediate use.

LIFE JACKETS AND LIFE BUOYS.

A life jacket of an approved type, or other appliance of equal buoyancy and capable of being fitted on the body, shall be carried for every person on board, and, in addition, a sufficient number of life jackets or other equivalent appliances suitable for children.

First. A life jacket shall satisfy the following conditions:

(a) It shall be of approved material and construction.
(b) It shall be capable of supporting in fresh water for 24 hours 15 pounds avoirdupois of iron.

Life jackets the buoyancy of which depends on air compartments are prohibited.

Second. A life buoy shall satisfy the following conditions:

(a) It shall be of solid cork or any other equivalent material.
(b) It shall be capable of supporting in fresh water for 24 hours at least 31 pounds avoirdupois of iron.

Life buoys filled with rushes, cork shavings, or granulated cork, or any other loose granulated material, or whose buoyancy depends upon air compartments which require to be inflated, are prohibited.

Third. The minimum number of life buoys with which vessels are to be provided is fixed as follows:

Length of the vessel under 400 feet, minimum number of buoys, 12; length of the vessel, 400 and under 600 feet, minimum number of buoys, 18; length of the vessel, 600 and under 800 feet, minimum number of buoys, 24; length of the vessel, 800 feet and over, minimum number of buoys, 30.

Fourth. All the buoys shall be fitted with beckets securely seized. At least one buoy on each side shall be fitted with a life line of at least 15 fathoms in length. The number of luminous buoys shall be not less than one-half of the total number of life buoys, and in no case less than six. The lights shall be efficient self-igniting lights which can not be extinguished in water, and they shall be kept near the buoys to which they belong, with the necessary means of attachment.

Fifth. All the life buoys and life jackets shall be so placed as to be readily accessible to the persons on board; their position shall be plainly indicated so as to be known to the persons concerned.

The life buoys shall always be capable of being rapidly cast loose, and shall not be permanently secured in any way. The owner of any vessel who neglects or refuses to provide and equip his vessel with such lifeboats, floats, rafts, life preservers, line-carrying projectiles, and the means of propelling them, drags, pumps, or other appliances, as are required under the provisions of this section, or under the regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce, authorized by and made pursuant hereto, shall be fined not less than $500, nor more than $5,000, and every master of a vessel who shall fail to comply with the requirements of this section, and the regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, approved by the Secretary of Commerce, authorized by and made pursuant hereto, shall upon conviction be fined not less than $50, nor more than $500. Section 4489 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

SEC. 15. That the owner, agent, or master of every barge which, while in tow through the open sea, has sustained or caused any accident, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 10, 11, 12, and 13 of chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large, approved June 20, 1874, and the reports therein prescribed shall be transmitted by collectors of customs to the Secretary of Commerce, who shall transmit annually to Congress a summary of such reports during the previous fiscal year, together with a brief statement of the action of the department in respect to such accidents.

SEC. 16. That in the judgment of Congress articles in treaties and conventions of the United States, in so far as they provide for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of the United States in foreign countries, and for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and the Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, and any other treaty provision in conflict with the provisions of this act, ought to be terminated; and to this end the President be, and he is hereby, requested and directed, within 90 days after the passage of this act, to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, that so much as hereinbefore described of all such treaties and conventions between the United States and foreign Governments will terminate on the expiration of such periods after notices have been given as may be required in such treaties and conventions.

SEC. 17. That upon the expiration after notice of the periods required, respectively, by said treaties and conventions and of one year in the case of the independent State of the Kongo, so much as hereinbefore described in each and every one of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and to be of no force and effect, and thereupon section 5280 and so much of section 4081 of the Revised Statutes as relates to the arrest or imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, shall be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 18. That this act shall take effect as to all vessels of the United States 6 months after its passage and as to foreign vessels 12 months after its passage, except that such parts hereof as are in conflict with articles of any treaty or convention with any foreign nation shall take effect as regards the vessels of such foreign nation on the expiration of the period fixed in the notice of abrogation of the said articles as provided in section 16 of this act.

SEC. 19. That section 16 of the act approved December 21, 1898, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," be amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"Provided, That at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, if any seaman incapacitated from service by injury or illness is on board a vessel so situated that a prompt discharge requiring the personal appearance of the master of the vessel before an American consul or consular agent is impracticable, such seaman may be sent to a consul or consular agent, who shall care for him and defray the cost of his maintenance and transportation, as provided in this paragraph."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, I am going to make it, and I will not withdraw it. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-seven Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 236 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Is a second demanded on this motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the rule a second is considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Whenever anyone demands one it is considered as ordered.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule it is considered as ordered, and the gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one hour.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to make one request, and that is to request leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. MERRITT, who has been sick for some time and is absent on account of sickness?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. MERRITT, who has been sick for a good long time and is still sick. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask leave of absence for Mr. SWITZER, of Ohio, who is ill with typhoid fever.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER], who is sick of typhoid fever. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked unanimous consent for leave of absence for Mr. SWITZER, of Ohio, who is sick in bed, of typhoid fever. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram announcing the death of my brother, and I would like to be excused for a few days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that Mr. HENRY GEORGE be excused. He has been obliged to leave here on account of illness, and is not able to be here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for leave of absence, indefinitely, for Mr. HENRY GEORGE.

Mr. DONOVAN. On what ground?

The SPEAKER. On the ground of sickness. In addition to that, he is bottled up in the war zone. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would ask unanimous consent for indefinite leave for my colleague [Mr. L'ENGLE], who is quite sick.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for leave of absence for his colleague [Mr. L'ENGLE], on account of sickness. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Is he ill?

The SPEAKER. He has been quite sick for a long time and utterly unable to get here. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the bill which is pending before the House was passed by the Senate on the 23d day of October last during the extra session of Congress. Some criticism has been visited on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for not bringing the bill before the House at an earlier day. I wish to state briefly that at the extra session under the rules of the Democratic caucus no legislation was in order except the tariff bill, the currency bill, and emergency legislation, and for that reason this bill came over to the present session. As most Members of the House know, on the 29th of October I left for London, having been appointed by the President of the United States a commissioner to the International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, which met in London on the 12th day of November, 1913, and returned to Washington on the 29th day of January, the conference having finished its labors and adjourned on the 20th day of January last and a few days after the beginning of this session. Early in December my colleague, Mr. HARDY, of Texas, the ranking member of the committee and acting chairman in my absence, began hearings on this bill. The hearings were confined to the lifeboat requirements of the bill. Those hearings were had before the Christmas holidays, and further hearings were postponed by consent until I should return from Europe. Following my return many demands came for hearings on other features of the bill, and those hearings were begun early in February and continued into March, there being hearings sometimes twice or three times a week. Following those hearings the bill was referred to a subcommittee, of which I was chairman, and considered two or three times each week until we finally agreed to the committee amendment by way of substitute for the Senate bill, and the bill was reported to the House on the 19th of June. There has not been a time from early in June that it would have been practicable for the committee to have had the bill considered in the House.

And this is the first time that it has been practicable to secure the consideration of the bill, and it is only made possible now by the gracious action of the membership of the House in permitting it to be considered by unanimous consent on motion to suspend the rules.

I wish to explain very briefly the provisions of the bill. Section 1 is substantially existing law, except it provides that in case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill. Under existing law the seamen should be of the same rating. We provide that they must be of the same or higher rating.

Section 2 amends the present law by regulating the hours of labor at sea by dividing the sailors into at least two and the firemen into three watches. This is the statute law of France and Germany. It is the custom in England and the custom protected by law in Norway and in port by establishing a nine-hour day, except on Sundays and legal holidays, when no unnecessary work shall be required. This, in substance, is the law of France, Germany, and Norway. The section applies to all merchant vessels of the United States of more than 100 tons gross, excepting those navigating rivers, harbors, bays, or sounds exclusively. It does not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.

Section 3 amends the present law by increasing the penalty for its violations.

Section 4 amends the present law by striking out the following words:

Unless the contrary be expressly stipulated in the contract.

In other words, under existing law the sailor has a right to demand half his pay at each port at which the vessel may call unless the contrary is provided in the contract. Of course the law was evaded or rendered inoperative by the shipping articles containing a provision denying the sailor that right. Hence we have amended that section of the law to provide that they shall receive one-half of the pay due them in each port, and any stipulation of the contract denying them that privilege shall be void, provided, however, the demand shall not be made oftener than once in five days. This section is made to apply to seamen on foreign vessels in the harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open for its enforcement.

Section 5 amends the existing law relative to determining the seaworthiness of a vessel while in a foreign port. The existing law provides that upon complaint made in writing, signed by the first or second officer and a majority of the crew, the consul or commercial agent may have a survey of the vessel made. We change the law so as to give a majority of the crew the right to have a survey made to ascertain whether or not the vessel is in a seaworthy condition, and this amendment makes the law conform to the law of several other maritime nations. I think Germany has that law, and some other nations have it.

Section 6 amends the existing law and provides that in vessels hereafter built the forecastle space allotted to each member of the crew shall not be less than 120 cubic feet. The existing law provides that the forecastle space shall not be less than 72 cubic feet. We make our law conform to that of Great Britain, France, and Germany, by allotting to the crew a larger forecastle space. We also provide more cleanliness and better sanitation for the quarters occupied by the crew.

Section 7 amends existing law so as to give the seaman the same freedom as landsmen when his vessel is in a safe harbor, and provides for enforcement of proper discipline while the vessel is at sea.

Section 8 amends existing law by striking out the words "reclaim deserters."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? What effect would that have by striking out the words?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 4600 as amended will provide:

That it shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination by every means in their power and, where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner—

And so forth.

Now, we have stricken out after the word "discountenanced," in line 5, the word "desertion," so that it shall read:

It shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination—

And so forth.

As I shall later explain, we make provision for repealing so much of our treaties as provides for the arrest and return of seamen for desertion, and we amend this section to harmonize with the other provisions of the bill relating to desertion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. For a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice that on page 30 it provides for placing those who continue to neglect their duty in irons. Is that not a very cruel and inhuman kind of punishment to inflict on a man who fails to do his duty?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have not relaxed any of the discipline on board ships. We leave the law as it is now and as it has been from time immemorial in that regard. We do not undertake to relax any of the discipline or the power in the master to enforce discipline on the ship, and if there is insubordination that is the punishment provided by existing law, and we have no disposition to relax it, nor is there any request from any quarter to have it relaxed.

Section 9 amends existing law relative to corporal punishment by enabling the seaman who has been thus punished to sue the master or owner of the vessel for damages if the master permits the officer guilty of the violation to escape. In that regard we change existing law.

Section 10 simply provides that seamen shall have a greater allowance of butter and water. But the testimony before the committee was to the effect that the food scale on our ships is better than that required by law, and sailors get all the butter and all the water they want, so that the requirement that the crew shall be furnished more butter and water is not very important, so far as that is concerned.

Section 11 amends the existing law by prohibiting advance payments and allotments of seamen's wages. This will destroy the power of the crimps, and we regard this section as one of the very important provisions of the bill.

Section 12 amends the existing law by extending to fishermen on deep-sea fishing vessels the provision which prohibits the attachment of the seamen's wages. We found by an investigation of the existing law that section 4536 of the Revised Statutes, which was passed in 1872, was amended in 1874, and the exemption under section 4536 applies only to seamen on ships in the foreign trade. Hence we repeal section 4536 and reenact the language, and make it applicable to fishermen as well as seamen, so that it will apply hereafter not only to seamen on vessels engaged in the foreign trade, but to the coastwise trade as well.

The wages of sailors will be exempt from attachment and execution without reference to the trade of the vessel, whether foreign or coastwise. I may say that the courts have generally construed the law to be that the exemption applies indiscriminately to the coastwise trade and the foreign trade, but the Supreme Court of Hawaii recently held differently, and for that reason we repeal the old section and enact this new section, giving it a general application, and removing all doubt about it.

Mr. MADDEN. So that under the law as reported by the committee there could be no garnisheeing proceedings against a man's wages?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; not of a seaman's or deep-sea fisherman's wages.

Section 13 is new in American maritime law. It proposes a standard of skilled and able seamen of three years' service on deck at sea and two years' service on deck on the Great Lakes. It provides a language test. It provides that at least 75 per cent of the crew in each department shall be able to understand the orders of their officers. It further provides that not less than 40 per cent in the first year, and 45 per cent in the second year, and 50 per cent in the third year, and 55 per cent in the fourth year, after the passage of the act, and thereafter 65 per cent of the deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices, shall be of a rating not less than that of an able seaman.

An able seaman is also defined thus:

Every person shall be rated an able seaman and qualified for service as such on the seas who is 19 years of age or upward and has had at least three years' service on deck on a vessel or vessels to which this section applies; and every person shall be rated an able seaman and qualified to serve as such on the Great Lakes and other lakes and on the bays or sounds who is 19 years old or upward and has had at least 24 months' service on deck on such vessel or vessels: Provided, That upon examination, under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce, as to eyesight, hearing, and physical condition he is found to be competent: And provided further, That upon examination, under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce, as to eyesight, hearing, physical condition, and knowledge of the duties of seamanship, men found competent may be rated as able seamen after having served on deck 12 months at sea; but further provided seamen examined and rated able seamen under this proviso shall not in any case compose more than one-fourth of the number of able seamen required by this section to be shipped or employed upon any vessel.

This last limitation is for the purpose of preventing an abuse of the law by rating all seamen able seamen after one year's service and having the crew of the vessel composed of one-year men. As I say, this is new in American law and is intended to provide for more efficient crews in the interest of safe navigation and safety of life at sea.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What change is this from existing law in regard to able seamen?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is new.

Mr. GOULDEN. I thought it was.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether in his opinion this section will apply to foreign ships that come into our ports? It is one of the most important sections in the bill, and I would like to have the gentleman's judgment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no exception. The language is general. It says—

That no vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating the rivers exclusively and the smaller inland lakes where the line of travel is at no point more than 3½ miles from land, and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew—

And so forth.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then do I understand from the gentleman that this provision describes, for instance, the character of a sailor that a Japanese vessel shall employ, his qualifications, and how he shall be paid? And if a Japanese vessel comes into an American port and anyone files an affidavit saying that the vessel has not complied with the provisions of our law in regard to crews, it will be the duty of the collector of customs to prevent that ship from clearing until we compel Japan to employ the kind of sailors that we prescribe—that they shall have served, for instance, two years on the Great Lakes?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I trust the gentleman will not make his question too long. My time is about expired now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then I will take the matter up later myself.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say that the section is very broad in its language.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman does think, then, that this section does apply to foreign ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no limitation in the section. I agree with the gentleman from Washington that it is a very important section of the bill.

Under section 4463 it is provided that—

Any vessel of the United States subject to the provisions of this title or to the inspection laws of the United States shall not be navigated unless she shall have in her service and on board such complement of licensed officers and crew as may, in the judgment of the local inspectors who inspect the vessel, be necessary for her safe navigation.

That power is lodged in the local inspectors. It is made their duty to determine how many men shall be employed in the different departments for the safe navigation of the vessel. It is their duty under existing law to see that a vessel is sufficiently and efficiently manned to meet all the exigencies of the voyage before permitting the vessel to leave port. Of that number, however, under this bill in the first year not less than 40 per cent and in successive years increasing 5 per cent a year to 65 per cent after the fourth year after passage of the act shall be able seamen, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices. I regard it as quite important that this should be understood. We are undertaking to provide for greater safety of life at sea by providing a standard of seamanship, and in order to do that we are trying to provide a rule by which it may be determined whether or not a man has the qualifications to make him an able seaman. There is much that can be said on this question, but I must hasten along, as my time is very limited.

Section 14 of this bill is a very important section, and relates to the life-saving equipment of passenger vessels and the manning of lifeboats, muster of the crew, and so forth; and I wish to say that in its application to ocean vessels, on routes more than 20 miles offshore, it is in the language of the London convention adopted on the 20th day of January last, which provides that all ocean-going vessels of the signatory States in the foreign trade shall be equipped with enough lifeboats for all. The London convention provides, however, that the boats must be in charge of an officer, petty officer, or seaman. Our bill provides that the boats shall be in charge of a licensed officer or able seaman. The balance of the crew of the lifeboats may be made up of certificated lifeboat men. The section defines certificated lifeboat men to be men who hold certificates of efficiency issued under the authority of the Secretary of Commerce and have been examined and are qualified to handle lifeboats. These men may be drawn from the crew, the deck crew, the steward's department, or the fireroom, provided they possess the necessary qualifications.

The section provides that at no moment of its voyage shall any passenger steam vessel of the United States on ocean routes more than 20 miles offshore have on board a total number of persons greater than for whom accommodation is provided in lifeboats and pontoon life rafts on board, and in no event shall the equipment in lifeboats be less than sufficient to accommodate 75 per cent of those on board, the balance in some cases may be life rafts under the regulations.

The bill provides further that ocean-going vessels on routes less than 20 miles offshore shall carry lifeboats and life rafts for all on board, not less than 75 per cent of the equipment to be lifeboats, except between May 15 and September 15 they shall be required to carry accommodations for not less than 70 per cent of the total persons on board in lifeboats and life rafts, one-half of which shall be in lifeboats and one-half may be in life rafts.

On the Great Lakes this provision is made as to all the routes more than 3 miles offshore; that the vessel shall be equipped with lifeboats and life rafts enough for all persons on board, not less than 75 per cent of the complement to be in lifeboats, except on routes over waters where the decks of the vessel would not be submerged in the event she should sink. However, it is further provided that during the interval from May 15 to September 15, inclusive, such vessels shall not be required to carry accommodations for more than 50 per cent of persons on board. Two-fifths of the equipment shall be in lifeboats and three-fifths may be in life rafts. On routes less than 3 miles offshore and on routes over waters where the decks of the vessel would not be submerged, and on the other lakes, and on rivers, bays, and sounds, the discretion is left with the Steamboat-Inspection Service, as now, to determine what the lifeboat and life-raft equipment may be. That discretion has been lodged in the Steamboat-Inspection Service from the beginning of the Government, as to all these trades, but we have taken away from the Steamboat-Inspection Service the discretion so far as ocean-going vessels are concerned and as to vessels on the Great Lakes whose routes are more than 3 miles offshore.

In these regards, except as to ocean-going vessels, we have modified the provisions of the Senate bill, which provides that all vessels on all routes, ocean going, on the Great Lakes, and on bays and sounds, should be equipped with lifeboats enough for all. The testimony before our committee was to the effect that on the Great Lakes, if this rule should be applied, it would absolutely destroy the value of vessels built under the regulations of the law in force at the time they were built. The testimony further showed that the passenger vessels on routes between Buffalo and Cleveland are never very far off shore or out of sight of another vessel for many minutes, seven or eight minutes, I believe Mr. Shantz stated. They are all equipped with wireless, they have life preservers for all, and their complement of lifeboats and life rafts, as provided by existing regulations, and the same necessity does not exist for full lifeboat equipment as on ocean-going vessels. We have relaxed the rule as far as we could, having due regard, of course, to safety of life at sea. The testimony before the committee showed that the lake passenger vessels carry millions of passengers yearly at a low rate of fare, and without loss of life through fault or negligence of their managers.

The sections 16 and 17 of the bill provide for the repeal of so much of our treaties with foreign nations as provide for the arrest and imprisonment of seamen deserting or who may be charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in ports of the United States, and the Territories and possessions thereof, and for the termination of any other treaty provisions in conflict with the provisions of the act.

I may say that this question has been agitated for many years. The Democratic national platform adopted in Baltimore in 1912 contained the following plank:

We urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of laws for the greater security of life and property at sea, and we favor the repeal of all laws and the abrogation of so much of our treaties with other nations as provide for the arrest and imprisonment of seamen charged with violation of their contract of service. Such laws and treaties are un-American and violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

The Republican national platform of 1912 contained the following declaration:

We favor the speedy enactment of laws to provide that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude, and that life and property at sea shall be safeguarded by the ample equipment of vessels with life-saving appliances and with full complements of skilled, able-bodied seamen to operate them.

Mr. Speaker, I see that I have occupied about 20 minutes. I did not intend to occupy more than 15 minutes, so I must give way.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I regret that I have not the time. I have already used more time than I intended to use, and I am trespassing on the time I have promised to others. I have only been able to give a hasty and very imperfect explanation of the provisions of this measure. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman withhold that motion?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Underwood resolution adopted this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma). The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the Underwood resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, the following Members were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Underwood resolution adopted this morning:

Mr. MONDELL, Mr. RAKER, Mr. LOBECK, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. SLOAN, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, Mr. BARTON, Mr. FALCONER, Mr. KEATING, Mr. DONOHOE, and Mr. GREENE of Vermont.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Panama Canal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Panama Canal. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cotton.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cotton. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives any information now available in the possession of the Bureau of Labor and Statistics concerning the public aid for home builders or aid to houseworking people in foreign countries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. I will say to the gentleman that this is a privileged resolution and that it can be referred to the committee. It may not be necessary to print it in this shape. It can be called up at any time as a privileged resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this is information that is already compiled and is of great importance to every Member of Congress. It is in regard to government aid to home builders and farmers in foreign countries, something that I am especially interested in.

Mr. MANN. Has it been printed by the department?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It has been compiled. I do not know whether it has been printed or not.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to know about that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the request of Mr. GALLIVAN for leave of absence on account of the illness of his son.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I shall object unless I know whether it is a serious illness or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 26, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. TALCOTT of New York, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1112), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 26, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 15657.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask what is the question pending before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment presented by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment to section 9b is pending, presented by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] for the committee.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] had the floor yesterday afternoon, and while we are waiting I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Thomas
Borah	Hollis	Overman	Thompson
Bryan	Hughes	Perkins	Thornton
Burton	Jones	Pittman	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene	Walsh
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	West
Clapp	McCumber	Shields	White
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Shively	Williams
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Gallinger	Myers	Smoot

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and also to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent from the city and is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My colleague [Mr. SWANSON] was called from the city by the illness of his father. I ask that this announcement may stand during his absence.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent and is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] is absent on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. LANE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. REED, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. TOWNSEND answered to their names when called.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is necessarily absent. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. KERN and Mr. CAMDEN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. GRONNA], who will necessarily be absent during the balance of the week.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. BRADY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. Yesterday House bill 16673 came from the House, a bill dealing with the subject of water power on the public domain, generally known as the Ferris bill. I am informed that it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

I desire to state for the information of the Senate that the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands has been considering a number of bills upon the same subject introduced in the Senate, and has done considerable work upon these bills. The committee is considering a measure substantially like the bill which has just come from the House. I think the bill ought to go, accordingly, to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands may be relieved from the consideration of the measure and that it be sent to that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly object, Mr. President, to that proposed change of reference, because the bill affects the public lands and it has been referred to that committee.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, it does not affect the public lands any more than bills which have already been introduced and which have gone to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. The Committee on Irrigation has done a very large amount of work upon the bills. The Senate may avail itself of the labors thus far done or it may not, as it sees fit; it is a matter of indifference to me.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that the Committee on Public Lands has spent five or six years on this question and has had hearings time and time again on it. The subject matter is one that affects the public lands of the United States, and the reference by the Vice President yesterday was perfectly proper, when he referred the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when we took a recess last evening I was discussing section 2 of the Clayton bill. I premised my remarks with the statement that I recognized that a discussion of the section was not pertinent to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and approved by the committee; but inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had gone over the whole subject—and very properly—I thought that I ought to make some observations upon the four sections which are involved in the work of the commission.

I made some rather severe criticism upon section 2 as it is, but I hope it will not be understood that I question the good faith and high purpose of those who prepared the section or the committee which reported it. I made these strictures in recognition of the difficulty of dealing with even so simple a subject as the discrimination in price made by a seller between various communities.

The Senator from Missouri believed that these sections were the only ones which increased the efficiency of the antitrust law and, as he described it, were the only sections that had teeth in them. My own opinion—and it is an honest, sincere opinion—is that there are not enough teeth in section 2 of the Clayton bill to masticate successfully milk toast, and I doubt whether teeth can be put into it without bringing under its condemnation a great many practices that are recognized to be honest and fair.

I will recapitulate very briefly what I said about section 2. It is the section to prohibit and prevent what is known as local price cutting, and in that way eliminating competition in the community. The section provides:

That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States.

If the section were to stop there, it would have teeth, but it would operate upon many transactions which we do not desire to prohibit. Therefore, those who prepared the section felt impelled to go further and make some qualification of the prohibition I have just read. There would be no difficulty at all in applying it if we were to pause at the point at which I have now arrived. It would not be difficult to prove that a seller had discriminated in price between different localities or different buyers in the same locality, but competition can not be preserved unless there is some discrimination. If the section were to stop there, it would do the very thing that we do not want it to do along with some things that we do want it to do. Therefore the authors of this section felt compelled to say that this discrimination must be "with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller." The very moment those words are inserted—and I am not suggesting even that they are not necessary words—a field is open for investigation which is more difficult to traverse, and questions are proposed for decision that are more difficult to decide, than any which will fall within the purview of the fifth section of the trade commission bill, which prohibits unfair competition.

What is it to wrongfully injure the business of a competitor? Can anyone define it so that we can understand in the beginning what it is to wrongfully—that is, I assume, to unlawfully—injure the business of a competitor? What declaration of the statute erects any standard to determine whether a particular injury done to a competitor is wrongful or otherwise? I am not insisting that it was not proper to use the word; but when it is used you draw a large part of the teeth of the section and render it comparatively harmless and innocuous.

But that is not all. That was not sufficient in order to relieve the statute from the charge that it covered a great many things that it ought not to cover. Therefore it was found necessary to add:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold.

If a seller can make a discrimination in price on account of a difference in the quantity of the article sold, there is no possibility of reaching a designing monopolist, because the quantity can be changed with the utmost ease. I thought when we were considering this section that we should have interposed the words "sales made under substantially similar conditions." Those words would have had latitude enough so that a mere variance of the quantity in comparing two sales would not relieve the transaction of the condemnation of the law.

But that is not all. There were other exceptions that had to be made in order to limit the proposed statute to things that are really evil. It proceeds:

Or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling.

There is an open door so wide that it can be entered with impunity and discriminations can be made without any fear of retribution. "Cost of selling." That includes overhead charges; it includes salesmen; it includes the difficulty of developing a particular field for trade; it includes everything that ever enters into the cost of selling a commodity in a particular place as compared with the cost of selling it elsewhere.

But that is not all. It is thought necessary to make still another exception:

Or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition and not intended to create monopoly.

If it is intended to create a monopoly the practice is already forbidden by the antitrust law as efficiently as it can be forbidden, because there we not only have the civil processes of the court for the correction of the evil, but we have the criminal processes of the court as well, with severe penalties. The section proceeds:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

We might just as well have said, so far as these last paragraphs are concerned, that the seller can do anything that he desires or pleases to meet competition that is not in violation of the antitrust law. If it is in violation of the antitrust law, we need no further condemnation or penalty. We have wound up this section practically by saying that the seller can do whatsoever he pleases with regard to his business, provided he does not violate the antitrust law; and yet this is one of the sections that have been proposed to strengthen the antitrust law, to add to the antitrust law, to accomplish the purpose of the antitrust law, by forbidding something that is not now forbidden by the statute.

In view of all these things, I believed when the section was before the committee, and I now believe, that we shall reach those practices which ought to be arrested, and restore to business that competition which ought to be maintained, more effectually through section 5 of the trade commission bill than we shall by the enactment of this section. Therefore I have favored the unfair-competition provision of the commission bill. That has nothing to do with the question of criminal penalty. If Congress desires to do so, it can attach a criminal penalty to the unfair-competition section of the commission bill; it can attach it here. It can declare that anyone guilty of unfair competition shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, and the penalty can be made just as severe as in the judgment of the Senate it ought to be made, in order to reach these offenders against good morals in business.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. It has been repeatedly stated during the course of the consideration of these two measures that the reason why it was not proper to attach a criminal penalty to the trade commission bill was because there was no definition in the trade commission bill of unfair practices or competition sufficiently definite so that the business man could tell what was fair and what was unfair until the commission had decided;

hence, that it would be a hardship and wrong to affix a criminal penalty to that bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I heard that view expressed in the Senate; I did not express it.

Mr. REED. I rose to ask the Senator if he was willing to attach a criminal penalty to the trade commission bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not vote for a criminal penalty.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. But not for the reasons stated by the Senator from Missouri. I have not that profound confidence in the execution of the criminal laws as a regulation of commerce that the Senator from Missouri has; I know it can be done, but——

Mr. REED. I was interested in the statement of the Senator. He was arguing here to Senators upon this side of the Chamber as against my proposition to attach a criminal penalty to specific acts of unfair or discriminatory practices, that we could avoid that by attaching a general criminal penalty to the trade commission bill, from which I would have been led to believe that he was in favor of attaching such a penalty and was offering that as an alternative.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. REED. But now it appears that the Senator, having stated to us that we can attach such a penalty, and using that as a means to defeat such a penalty being attached to these provisions now before us, intends if it were attempted to attach it to endeavor to defeat the effort. So I do not think the Senator ought to make that argument, because the Senator does not propose to concur in that action.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri has, I think, no warrant in drawing the conclusion he has as to my own attitude. I stated that the Senate could attach a criminal penalty if the Senate believes that the criminal courts are the best means of enforcing such a regulation. I do not so believe. I believe that the object is to prevent these practices, and I believe that we will prevent them more effectually through the civil processes of the law than we will through the criminal processes of the law, for juries will not convict a defendant for doing a thing which is so difficult to understand as is section 2 in regard to discriminations in price.

I said last night there will be now and then a case which shocks the moral sense of the country in connection with which we can convict criminally under section 2, but in the great majority of cases I doubt whether a conviction could be secured, and if it could not be secured it to that extent impairs the efficiency of the law.

Mr. REED. Now, the Senator states that he does not believe in attaching the criminal penalties because he thinks they would not be enforcible. Does he believe in attaching any civil penalties to the trade commission bill or to any of this legislation, except merely that an injunction may be issued?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do; and I earnestly attempted to secure a penalty of that kind. I was in favor, as the Senator from Missouri must know, of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] which attached threefold damages, and I would heartily favor the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to attach a civil penalty in the nature of punitive or exemplary damages. I want simply to be understood as saying that if we were to attach a criminal penalty to section 5 of the trade commission bill, I believe that it would impair rather than strengthen its force, for the reasons which I have stated.

Mr. REED. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he is willing to attach a civil penalty; I had forgotten that he had supported the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. I supported that amendment and voted for it, but it did not get very much support in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; unfortunately it did not.

Mr. REED. This seems to be the situation: When it is proposed to attach a criminal penalty, everybody holds up his hands and says, "No; that will not do"; and when it was proposed to attach a civil penalty, even the mild penalty of permitting an injured party to recover damages, the Senate by a very decisive majority voted that down, so that we are left here now with nothing in the world proposed as a penalty, except that if an injunction is violated after that injunction has become a final judgment the act can then be punished by contempt of court proceedings.

I am making that statement merely preliminary to asking the Senator this question: When you come to the question of the violation of an injunction which has been issued against certain trade practices, as, for instance, local price cutting, and an injunction is issued commanding that that practice shall cease, that injunction probably will not be finally issued until four or five years after the litigation has been brought. Does the Senator think that a trader would have any difficulty in slightly changing the form of his scheme, and then contending that he had not violated the injunction and demanding and getting a trial by jury and probably getting off?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I hope that the guilty person would not escape on account of the change we are about to make in the contempt or judicial sections of this bill. I hope that the result would be even greater certainty; but the Senator from Missouri, I think, exaggerates the situation. The purpose of section 5 in the trade commission bill is to bring about a cessation of unfair competition in the beginning before it ripens into monopoly.

If the view which I hold of the law is sustained, and if we have the power to give some effect to the order of the commission, an injunction will be issued against the offending corporation or person, and there will be no appeal that can destroy the effect of that injunction. An appeal—and I care not how it is taken—does not suspend the operation of an injunction unless the court specifically so declares. A mere appeal, a mere review on the part of the court, leaves the injunction in full force and effect, to continue until the end of the litigation.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think, then, that this trade commission, proceeding under the vague authority of the clause which provides "that unfair competition is hereby declared to be unlawful," can issue an order, and that order will remain in full force and effect pending the appeal?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. REED. And there can be no relief by any process of law from that order until the appeal has been heard?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is in the law now no relief in the great proportion of instances. I speak advisedly. If a complainant applies for an injunction and the injunction issues, an appeal from the decree does not suspend the injunction.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, it is a matter of common practice that the question as to whether the appeal and a supersedeas bond do or do not suspend the injunction rests with the court; and in a majority of cases where an injunction is issued against a business practice, if there is an appeal taken, I undertake to say that the appeal suspends the injunction.

Mr. CUMMINS. I differ from the Senator from Missouri with regard to that, and say that in the great majority of instances an appeal from an order granting an injunction, or a decree commanding an injunction, does not suspend the operation of the injunction.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me one word further, if that is true, then you have put it in the power of the trade commission to destroy absolutely any business in this country, and to all intents and purposes you have denied any practical relief in the courts, for this reason: If a man is running a business, and the trade commission can issue an order commanding him to quit following that business, and that order is conclusive upon him until he can have it set aside, it may be four or five years before a final decree can be entered, and in the meantime his business has been or may be completely ruined. It is easy to imagine such cases. It seems to me that if that construction is correct we have done here a most monstrous thing, an utterly indefensible thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Missouri has a peculiar view of this legislation. The very moment we do make it so that it will accomplish something it then becomes enormous and outrageous and an invasion upon the right of the citizen; but when we do not make it so that it will accomplish anything it then is without teeth and harmless.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not quite understand the view of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me to make it plain, I believe in giving every man his rights under the law, in giving every man his chance of a fair trial and his day in court; but if at the end of that trial it is found that he is a law violator, I then want a penalty affixed which will warn him and others not to repeat that offense. The attitude on the other side seems to be that you are to vest this power in a commission, that the power of the commission is to be absolute, that there is no relief from it except after long litigation in the courts, that the commission can arbitrarily decide a case any way it wants to, and that no man can get any relief from its decisions, no matter what his legal rights may be, until he has succeeded in reversing it in a court. That is going further than anybody went in arguing the trade commission bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course if I were to allow the Senator from Missouri to state my case for me and to state my position, it would not be difficult for him to find great objection to it; but he does not state the case as I view it, and he comes very far from stating my view with regard to the matter.

The order of the commission is ineffective. It is not a judicial tribunal. It can not enforce its commands. It must apply to a court before its order can operate effectually upon the offending corporations or persons, and when the commission applies to the court it has its day in court.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. A certain effect must be given to the order of the commission, but nevertheless the court must find it to be a lawful order. It must find that there was evidence before the commission which was sufficient to establish unfair competition; and until the court so finds there can be no injunction. When the court issues the injunction the defendant has already enjoyed all the opportunities that a successful regulation of commerce should confer upon him, and the injunction ought then to stand until the case is finally decided, if it ever reaches another judicial tribunal.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator has correctly stated the procedure up to the point of the issuance of the injunction; but I understood him a few moments ago to argue that the order of the commission was immediately in force, and therefore that my argument that there was no effective means offered was a bad argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not intend to so state.

Mr. REED. Now it appears that the only difference between my statement and the Senator's is this: The Senator admits that the order of the commission is of no validity or force, until——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not. I did not say that.

Mr. REED. Well, that its injunction is of no force or effect until it has gone into court and all of the delay incident to such a proceeding has occurred. The only difference remaining between the Senator and myself is that I contend that when the court has issued its order an appeal properly lodged may have the effect, at least within the discretion of the court, of further suspending the injunction until it is heard on appeal, so that there is not a very great difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri, of course, did not understand me to mean at any time that the order of the commission could operate as an injunction capable of being enforced without application to the courts. I have made that so clear so many times that I feel that I need not review it. But an injunction will issue, if the case is a good one, immediately—as soon as the defendant refuses to obey the order of the commission—and unless there be sound and substantial reasons for an appellate tribunal superseding the effect of the injunction it will remain. I was simply pursuing this argument to show that the fears which the Senator from Missouri has—that years and years would elapse in which the offender would be permitted to go on and prey upon the community—were not well founded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will suffer one more interruption, the Senator has just said that an injunction would issue immediately, yet he has said that the man shall have his day in court. Now, manifestly the injunction can not issue immediately if a man is to have his day in court. The commission can go into court complaining of A. B. Thereupon A. B., if he is to have his day in court, is entitled to his trial, and all of the delays incident to a trial will occur here, as they will in other cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri, it seems to me, is hypercritical this morning. I said "immediately," meaning, of course, immediately upon the refusal of the offending corporation to obey the order of the commission, and as a part of section 5 there are reenacted all of the provisions of the present law with regard to the speeding of cases under the antitrust law and under the interstate commerce law, so that the interval between the refusal of the corporation to obey the order of the commission and the issuance of the injunction or the refusal to issue the injunction must be negligible and can not embrace a time that will work disaster to the people.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me now to go to section 4?

Mr. REED. I should like to say just one word, with the Senator's permission. The Senator has said that the same methods of speed and haste will be observed, and must be observed, that are now observed with reference to the enforcement of the antitrust act. If we are to take that as our guide, it takes about two and one-half years to get a judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator from Missouri is wholly wrong.

Mr. REED. I think I am not wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the antitrust law the Government files a bill and may apply for a temporary injunction. If it secures the temporary writ, whatever it is aimed to arrest is arrested at once, and that continues during the whole course of the proceeding. If the Government does not want an injunction, but desires to await the final termination of the suit, then there is the period, or something like the period, suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. There never has been one of those injunctions issued yet, except on the hearing, so far as I know.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, Mr. President, under the interstate-commerce law there have been scores of injunctions issued within a few hours after the application for the injunction. I do not now recall how many preliminary injunctions have been entered, or when they were entered, in the enforcement of the antitrust law. I have not examined that subject, but there is no more delay than is incident to the enforcement of any law.

I reassert it as my opinion—I have high regard for those who hold a different opinion, but I reassert—that the people of this country will secure vastly more relief under a prohibition against unfair competition, it matters not whether it is enforced by a commission or whether it is enforced by the criminal law, than they will secure under section 2 so far as discriminations are concerned.

I would not have dwelt so long upon this section if it were not for one proposition which I think must appeal very strongly to every lawyer here, and to those who are really concerned in making our statutes more efficient in preventing this evil.

If the unfair-competition section remains in the commission bill and we now pass this section, what is the inevitable inquiry? What conclusion must a court draw when it comes to survey the whole field? It can draw but one conclusion, and that is that we did not regard the acts which are forbidden in section 2 as coming within the prohibition against unfair competition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator, then, hold that we never again ought to enact any specific law against any trust or monopoly practice?

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, I think there are many laws that we ought to enact.

Mr. REED. Then, every time we enact one of them, the Senator can rise in his place and say the same thing with reference to it that he is now saying with reference to section 2 and section 3.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator will not say it. The Senator who is now speaking endeavors to adhere to the line of reason. It is idle for the Senator from Missouri to attempt to becloud the atmosphere by any such suggestion as that. There are a great many practices in the commercial and industrial world which ought to be forbidden specifically, and to which penalties ought to be attached, but this is not one of them. Why? Because this is the plainest and the clearest instance of unfair competition that can be found in all the history of business and commerce.

Mr. REED. Suppose we were to add to this section this phrase, "and such practice shall be held to be included within the term 'unfair competition,' and the trade commission is hereby given concurrent jurisdiction with the courts to enforce the same"?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would have no objection to that, provided you were to take from this section those elements which destroy its strength. This section, as it is now composed, requires the combination of many more elements in a particular transaction than will the phrase or term "unfair competition."

If we are to limit unfair competition so far as price cutting or discrimination in price to the cases which would fall within this section, as it can be condemned under this section, we have mutilated beyond recognition the doctrine of unfair competition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to say on this section before the Senator leaves it, I do not appear here as a special advocate of section 2. My motion related to section 4.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am coming to that.

Mr. REED. The Senator is talking about section 2.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri discussed section 2 in his review of the bill, and I felt it necessary in view of the things he said to express my own opinion, too.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the Senators perhaps ought to know the state of the record. Section 2 has been out of the bill, and has been for some time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that; and I took the liberty of referring to section 2, because the Senator from Missouri debated section 2. I have said more than once I recognized that my discussion of this particular subject is not relevant to the question before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand the parliamentary situation. I also understand that the bill is before the Senate and that these various sections are in a way interrelated, and I think it is highly proper to discuss the question in this way, if Senators so desire.

I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, since he has criticized particularly the language of section 2 and the exceptions or qualifying clauses contained in section 2, to a bill which was offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and which contains this language—I will abbreviate it somewhat:

That any person, firm, etc., engaged in commerce * * * that shall, intentionally or otherwise, for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor or creating a monopoly in any locality, discriminate between sections, communities, or localities by selling a commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or locality than is charged for such commodity by said party in any other section, community, or locality, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the actual cost of transportation from the point of production if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture if a manufactured product, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

I call the Senator's attention to that language because it is a practical copy of the statute of Minnesota, which I understand has been tested out in the courts and sustained by the courts. I should like to have the Senator's view as to whether that does not present a rule which might govern.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have for a long time been familiar with the statute of Minnesota. My own State passed a similar statute before the Legislature of Minnesota took up the question. When our statute was originally passed it was directed solely against oil products, and it did not contain even all the limitations or exceptions which were afterwards put into the Minnesota statute. The Minnesota statute, with the exception of a few words, follows the Iowa statute almost literally. As applied to a single product, the distribution of which was well known and the course of business in which was well understood, I felt that the Iowa statute was rather to be preferred, but if it is to be applied to the whole business of the country I like the Minnesota statute.

I think everybody knows that for a long time I have been an advocate for a prohibition against this discrimination that was intended to create a monopoly and that had the effect, if followed to its end, of creating a monopoly, but there are five or six or seven exceptions in section 2 that are not found in the Minnesota statute, and I pointed them out.

Mr. REED. I understand. I understand the Senator has for many years been friendly to the class of legislation which is outlined in the Minnesota statute and that he supported the Iowa statute, and I think I am correct in saying the supreme court of Iowa has sustained the Iowa statute. Has it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is very much the same. But the Senator from Missouri must remember that it was a provision in Iowa and in Minnesota limited, in the first instance, to a single product or a series of products which arise from the manufacture of oil.

Mr. REED. That was wholesome in those two States.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has been extended to other things in my State.

Mr. REED. I say it was wholesome there. Why is it not wholesome here? You passed it there and added a severe penalty.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is wholesome. I am not prepared to say, however, that it can be applied to every business and to every phase of every business. I have not investigated carefully enough to assert whether it can be or not, but the principle of it is right, and I have believed that it would be enforced completely and efficiently in the section which prohibits unfair competition.

I now pass to section 4. As I understand the Chair, the vote by which section 4 was stricken from the bill has been reconsidered. I have grave doubt whether the thing that is intended to be prohibited in section 4 furnishes an instance of unfair competition. Men of great experience and study differ from me with regard to that, but putting the case that was so often put yesterday, of a patented article to which was tied a series of unpatented articles, and open therefore to the general trade, and concerning which an agreement is made that the purchaser if he takes the patented article must buy all these other things from the owner or seller of the patented article—taking that instance, I am not prepared to say that it could not be held as unfair competition. But I am very far from being convinced that it would necessarily be held to be unfair competition, and therefore I have been from the beginning in favor of condemning that thing and of prohibiting it specifically and making it unlawful. That has been my attitude; it has been all the while and is now.

That does not, however, mean that I think section 4 as it is ought to become the law. It ought not to become the law as it is because it prohibits many things which I regard as innocent. Not only do I regard them as innocent, but I regard them as necessary and essential for the preservation of competition in various fields of commerce and industry.

If this section prohibited only the tying in of articles, I would be warmly and heartily for it, but it prohibits other transactions than the tying in of a series of articles into a single transaction, accompanied with an agreement or promise that the buyer will not purchase the same articles from anyone else or not deal in the same article manufactured by anyone else. Let us see. The section reads this way:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price—on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller.

I take a case that is very common in my own State. We have a company that has a dominating influence in the manufacture of cereals. It has a product which, for illustration, we will say is well known as Quaker Oats. We all know it as oatmeal.

Then take another manufactory in my State that makes exactly the same thing, and we will assume for the purpose of argument that it calls its product Rolled Oats. The manufacturer of Quaker Oats has acquired a great dominance in the trade and his product has a high standing everywhere. The small competitor comes into the field desiring to introduce exactly the same thing. There is no patent about it; there is no secret, indeed, about the process of making it. It all depends upon the trade name, and it comes finally to be sold under its trade name. He brings his product into the market and calls it Rolled Oats. The only way in which he can make progress against his competitor is to secure a dealer in a town or community who will take his product under his trade name and make an especial effort to introduce it among the consumers of that product. He must select one dealer, if he makes headway in his struggle with the manufacturer already in the field.

Therefore he goes to a wholesale grocer or he goes to a retail dealer in that community and he says, "If you will take my product, Rolled Oats, and agree not to sell the Quaker Oats, which is exactly the same thing, you shall have the exclusive privilege of selling it in this community, and you can make what the dealers call a campaign for its introduction." I say that that transaction is not only an innocent one, but I think it is necessary in order to preserve competition among the manufacturers of the product.

Now, again, I take a well-known——

Mr. REED. Would it interrupt the Senator now——

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator will not begin an argument with me——

Mr. REED. I will not, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because I desire to finish what I have to say and leave the floor to others.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. Take the well-known instance of a Hanan shoe and a Burt shoe, a Stetson hat and a Knox hat. The manufacturers of the Hanan shoe are competing all the while with the manufacturers of the Burt shoe. The manufacturers of the Stetson hat are competing daily with the manufacturers of the Knox hat. They both, under these trade names, have secured a standing in the business world.

We want to preserve the competition between the producers of these commodities, called by different names, but which are in and of themselves identical, serving the same purpose and serving it equally well. I do not want by my vote to make the struggle of the smaller man against his established competitor more difficult by declaring that he can not choose a single seller or a single dealer in the community and introduce in that way and under those conditions the product which he is manufacturing or selling. It is wholly different from the tying-in contract.

We observe in this section exactly the same difficulty about defining things, about trying to make the law cover the exact evil which we desire to suppress and not to cover anything else that I have already discussed with regard to section 2.

Can this section be limited to the real tying-in contracts? It has been called the tying-in section throughout, apparently without any knowledge and certainly without any suggestion upon the floor of the Senate that it covers not only the tying-in contracts, but a great many others that are, as I believe, an essential part of our commerce.

I could extend the illustrations that I have made indefinitely. I could extend them to every sort of product in which one man or manufacturer has established for himself a reputation or a name in the particular business. I therefore would find it difficult to vote for this section as it is, glad as I would be to vote for it if it were limited to the real evil which we desire to reach and overcome, and I would vote for it notwithstanding the declaration against unfair competition in the commission bill, because I am not convinced that the so-called tying-in arrangement is an example of unfair competition. If I thought it was as clearly as I believe section 2 to be an instance of it, then I would insist with regard to section 4, as I have with regard to section 2, that it should be remitted to the commission bill and to the enforcement under the declaration for unfair competition.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator a question now, not to argue the matter?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator willing, if section 4 is drawn so that it is limited to the tying-in contracts, to have a penal clause attached to it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am. I am not only willing, but I am anxious to have it, because there is no difficulty about that transaction whatever. It does not depend upon anybody's discretion, and there would be no trouble about enforcing the law through the criminal court. What I want is an enforcement of the law. What I want is to prevent the occurrence of the transactions which impede commerce and which oppress the people. If I believe that this object can be secured more effectually through the administration of a criminal penalty, then I am for the criminal penalty.

If I believe that it can be enforced better and the evil prevented more surely without a criminal penalty, then I am for the civil process. It all depends upon the character of the act forbidden as to whether a fine or imprisonment is more effective than the injunction of a court in preventing a recurrence.

Mr. President, I beg the attention of the Senate a moment to sections 8 and 9. I think no one contends that the things here sought to be prohibited are examples of unfair competition; I think that no one ought to insist that legislation upon those subjects should be remitted to the unfair-competition section of the trade commission bill. Interlocking directors and the holding of the stock of one corporation by a rival do not constitute unfair competition; they constitute the suppression of competition, or at least furnish a motive for the failure of two or more corporations to compete with each other, although they may be engaged in the same business. I believe that both these sections ought to be administered by the trade commission, and I am thoroughly in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to reconcile the procedure for their administration as contained in this bill with the procedure already established in the trade commission bill. I think that is so obvious that no one ought to question it. If they are to be administered by the commission at all, the same procedure ought to obtain that we have already provided for in the former bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he thinks sections 8 and 9 should be passed without any criminal or penal clause whatever attached?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that sections 8 and 9 will be more effectually enforced and that the people will be relieved of the burden created by interlocking directors and by holding companies more speedily and more certainly through a civil process than through a criminal process.

Mr. REED. But there might be a very severe penalty going with a civil process. I want to know whether the Senator insists that sections 8 and 9 should go into this bill without any penalty attached, except that the injunction may be issued by the trade commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to attach a penalty, but I am not in favor of administering the sections in the first instance through a grand jury, because I do not believe that they will ever be enforced in that way, and if we rely upon it we shall continue to be afflicted by this community of corporations and community of directors as we have heretofore been. I want to stop it as quickly as possible.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator from Iowa wants to stop it, and I want to stop it; and the Senator has been very kind in submitting to many interruptions from me; but I am in earnest about getting his views.

The Senator does not want a criminal penalty; that is, he does not want to provide fine and imprisonment; but he says he is willing to have a civil penalty attached. I take it the Senator means by that a civil penalty other than the one which the trade commission will be authorized to inflict?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe in a civil penalty, to be awarded to anyone who is injured in a sufficient degree to make the offenders who feel that they are offenders fearful of the consequences.

Mr. REED. That is something embodying the thought that was in the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], which provided for the recovery of damages at the suit of injured parties—something of that nature.

Mr. CUMMINS. Something of that nature, although I do not limit my desire to that. I am willing to take it in any form in which it can be written.

The reason that I am not in favor of a criminal penalty attached to sections 8 and 9 in the first instance is this—I am now speaking of the two parts of sections 8 and 9 which I have already mentioned: There must always be found somewhere, by some tribunal, the fact as to whether the two corporations involved are competitive, and that is a question upon which there will be from time to time the widest difference of opinion among honest men. There are some corporations which you can take up and instantly declare that they are competitive or ought to be competitive; but there are a great many corporations doing business so dissimilar in one respect and yet so united in another that it requires the exercise of sound judgment to determine whether they are or are not competitive. This is not only true with respect to the character of business, but it is true of the location of the business.

Who can tell, without most serious study, whether a wholesale grocery house in the city of New York is a competitor with a wholesale grocery house in the city of San Francisco or in Denver? The comparison might be extended between other points widely separated by distance. Therefore the first thing that has to be determined by some tribunal in all these inquiries as to interlocking directors and as to holding companies is, Are the corporations involved competitors or ought they to be competitors? Does the doctrine of competition and independence in business require that those corporations shall be independent of each other?

I am very much in sympathy with the remark made yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see a statute that would absolutely prohibit one corporation from owning the stock of another. It matters not whether the corporations be competitive or whether they be entirely separated in business. I think it is against public policy to allow one corporation to hold the stock of another. I think it permits the pyramiding of capital and the concealment of interest in so many cases to the detriment of the people that we ought not to allow the condition to exist in any case. That was the common law; the wisdom of our forefathers absolutely forbade one corporation holding the stock of another. We, however, have gradually, apparently by force of circumstances and the great development that seemed for the moment to require it, departed from the rule of the common law, and now nearly every State in the Union permits corporations organized under its laws to hold the stock of other corporations.

I will not dwell, however, upon that phase of it; but we are here attempting to supplement the antitrust law and to carry its object more certainly into effect by trying to make corporations which are engaged in the same business or in a competitive business independent of each other, so that in their management each will be conducted for the best interests of its stockholders and not with regard to the interests of the stockholders of any other corporation or any other association.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator in that laudable purpose, but how does the Senator propose to accomplish it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will indicate that. Now I come to close proximity with the question really under consideration, because the Senator from Montana proposes to create by reference a certain tribunal, certain procedure, for the administration of these two sections. The fault I find with these sections is this: Section 8 relates to intercorporate stockholding and provides—

> That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce—> where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Let it be observed, first, that this legalizes, in so far as the laws of the United States are concerned, former acquisitions of stock—I do not mean that, exactly; I do not think that it legalizes them under the antitrust law, but, so far as this statute is concerned, it is recognized that the corporation which now holds the stock of other corporations may continue to hold it. I am opposed to that license. I do not think that a corporation which has acquired stock in the past should be at any more liberty to continue to hold it against a policy which we now establish than though it were acquired in the future. That is my first objection to it, and I think it is a very grave objection, because the corporate holdings of the United States are pretty well crystallized, and we will not reach the evil which we have in view if we allow all existing stockholdings to continue uninterrupted and untouched.

Some one will say possibly that we have no constitutional power to change that situation. We have no constitutional power to take the stock that a corporation has legally acquired, but we have a right to say that no corporation which holds stock in that way or of that character shall continue to engage in commerce among the States. We must give the offending corporation the opportunity to dispose of stocks that have been acquired in the past, of course; but after reasonable time shall have elapsed we can say to the corporation, "You shall not be an instrumentality of commerce among the States if you hold the stock of another corporation engaged in commerce and with which you ought to be in competition."

My second objection to the section is that in order to invalidate the transaction we require proof that the holding by one company of the stock of its rival substantially lessens competition between the two. In many cases we can not prove it; and I say again that in prescribing such a standard the bill opens wide the door for violation and for escape. I intend to offer a substitute for that section, but before I call attention to it, I think I ought to read a little further:

> This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition. Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Again, you have surrounded the prohibition with so many exceptions and so many immunities; you have so many avenues for escape that the section will fall into disuse and it will fail. Why should we make an exception with regard to subsidiary corporations? If they are competitive corporations, the relation ought not to exist, and if they are not competitive corporations, then the prohibition does not apply. I intend——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a moment right there. Does not the Senator think that in effect that section may legalize some things that are contrary to the Sherman law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am afraid so, because we find in the very last paragraph of this section this proposition:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything prohibited and made illegal by the antitrust laws.

I do not want to see the prohibition surrounded by this multitude of exceptions and limitations. I do not remark upon that part of the section relating to common carriers, because I think that we ought not to put into this bill anything with regard to common carriers. I think that when we attempt to regulate common carriers the regulation should be made part of the interstate-commerce law, should be made an amendment of that law, and we should not divide our forces by attempting now to make part of the regulation here and part of it in the interstate-commerce law, and I intend to offer——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I intend to offer when the railroad securities bill comes before the Senate—I believe it is before the Senate, but when it comes up for consideration—I intend to offer a provision against interlocking directors and against intercorporate stockholdings of common carriers, and there is where the regulation should be, not here. I now yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. He spoke about the vice of subsidiary companies in section 8. Does not the Senator recall the discussion as to the source of that exception?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes; I do.

Mr. CHILTON. For instance, take this kind of a situation: Take what is commonly supposed to be the great Telephone Trust. That is sought to be met in various sections by small companies. It is not always possible for one company conveniently to build up opposition to a situation of that kind, and it must meet the bigger octopus as it is, not as it would like to have it. Now, take a small company. It will go to one section. It will find there a certain condition as to another small company. It may want to take that over as a line of opposition to the great octopus. Now, it may be so that it can not buy the physical property. It may be that it will have to buy a part of the stock.

That is true in all lines. We find that practically every line of business is already occupied by a great corporation. We can not make a law here applying to that great corporation without in a way hampering the small man and the small enterprising people who want to meet it in competition. They have the ground already covered and their situation already made.

Mr. CUMMINS. The statement of the Senator from West Virginia is not conclusive. In the first place, as I remarked a moment ago, I do not think we ought to deal with common carriers at all in this bill. The provisions we have in this bill for the regulation of common carriers in that respect are, to my mind, very inadequate, and a telephone company is a common carrier; so we may dismiss, as far as my argument is concerned, the problem as it is related to common carriers.

Mr. CHILTON. I will say to the Senator that I used that illustration simply because it happened to come to my mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I come next to the other objection made. Of course, if we are not going to try to do anything with the big corporations that are holding stocks that they ought not to hold, if we are going to legalize all their transactions by allowing them to continue to hold the stock of competitive corporations, although they are engaged in interstate commerce, then there is a good deal of force in the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia; but I want to destroy that, and so far as all corporations are concerned, other than common carriers, there is no reason in the law why the corporation shall not own all the property with which it carries on its business. There is no reason which has ever come to my notice which requires that a single business shall be divided into a series of corporations.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator will recall the consideration as to our power in the premises. If we have the power, if there be no doubt that we can go into any State and regulate holdings, if that be not a consideration, of course we can break up these corporations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, we can not do that.

Mr. CHILTON. We could do that if we had plenary power, as the States have; but in meeting any situation we have to meet the business, and if by killing the main thing—that is, the octopus—we make it impossible for small men to engage in it, we have done nothing for the people and nothing for competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the Senator from West Virginia manifests his accustomed fairness.

Mr. CHILTON. I meant to be fair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator meant to be fair, but we are talking now about one corporation holding the stock of another. I say it ought not to be permitted at all, but we can not go that far; we ought, however, to prevent one corporation holding the stock of another, the two being engaged in a competitive business. There may be some reason why that principle can not be carried out in its fullness in the case of common carriers. I am not considering them now; but there is no suggestion that I have ever heard that would prevent the principle from having its full and complete application not only with regard to existing corporations but with regard to all future corporations, so far as ordinary commerce and industry are concerned. It is a sound, wise policy for any country to adopt and maintain. That is the policy, I think, intended to be announced in the section.

I have already called attention to various imperfections of the section; but the chief one is that it requires the Government, or whoever enforces the law, to prove that the fact that when one corporation holds a part of the stock of another it has the effect of substantially lessening competition between the two corporations. We ought not to be compelled to enter upon that inquiry. It is a statement that is immensely difficult of actual proof, although every reasonable, sane man knows that it does have the tendency to eliminate or lessen competition. We ought to go one step further back and say that, inasmuch as we know that the ownership by a corporation engaged in commerce of the stock of another corporation engaged in commerce does tend to eliminate competition and does tend to destroy the rivalry that should exist, therefore, when that one fact is shown—namely, that the two corporations are or ought to be competitive with each other—the stockholding becomes unlawful, without requiring any further inquiry or investigation.

The amendment which I intend to offer to section 8 provides as follows—I am not reading it in full, but I am reading that part of it which relates to the subject I have just been discussing:

It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to acquire—

That takes care of the future—

own, hold, or control—

That takes care of the existing situation—

the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital or any other means of control or participation in the control of any other corporation also engaged in commerce, if the business of such corporations is naturally, and by reason of character and location, competitive.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I have listened with intense interest, as I always do, to the Senator. It seems to me that right there he is getting again into the very dilemma that he has suggested in the illustration of the two grocery houses as to whether they would be in competition, one located at one point and one at another. It does seem to me that we should assume that two corporations engaged in the same business are in competition, and that consequently neither of those corporations should hold any of the stock of another corporation engaged in the same business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true; and I have been fighting for a good while to get it so expressed; but the Senator from Minnesota is the first friend of the proposition, aside from myself, I have ever had the pleasure of hearing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say that I insisted before the committee that there should be no ownership by one corporation of the stock of another; and I think if we can not get that the Senator's amendment would be all right, provided he would adopt the language suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, and simply make the fact that they are in the same general line of business the test.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to adopt it, and it was in the amendment as I originally offered it in a bill that is now pending before the Senate. I have expressed it in almost the language just employed by the Senator from Minnesota; that is to say, that one corporation could not hold the stock of another if they were engaged in the same kind of business, no matter where they were located. When I came to propose this amendment as a part of the commission bill—and I thought it ought to be a part of the commission bill—I made just as strong a fight for it in the Committee on Interstate Commerce as I was capable of making, but finally met the result that you have all seen, namely, that the bill should be reported—and it was reported—with nothing but inquisitorial powers conferred upon the commission.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that I hope the Senator will offer his amendment, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota. A good many of us are not members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, but we would like to have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will offer it. I have read it in the present form because this is the form in which it was originally offered to the Interstate Commerce Committee. It was originally put on the commission bill, and I have read it here in the form in which it was agreed to there; but it finally fell, under the adverse circumstances I have recited. However it is expressed, it is the mere fact of competition that ought to decide the whole situation. If the corporations are competitors, if they are engaged in the same kind of business, there ought not to be between them any such community as is created by one of them holding the stock of the other.

With regard to section 9, I intend only to refer to that——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon another interruption, it is perhaps not exactly germane, but I should like to make it at this time.

Of course, I realize that at this time we can deal with this matter only with reference to competition; but the whole policy of allowing one corporation to hold the stock of another, even if they are not engaged in the same business, is vicious; and there is, perhaps, no one factor so important in the development of the credit trust of this country—sometimes called the Money Trust—as this pyramiding of stock. One day I took occasion to start a computation with $1,501, and I found that if you could have your corporations adjusted with reference to the capital stock of the one related to the other it took only a few multiplications for that $1,501 to control a million-dollar corporation. I realize, of course, that at this time we can deal with it only from the viewpoint of competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Minnesota says is absolutely sound, and some time the American people will adopt that policy.

I desire in closing to say a word with regard to a portion of section 9. I do not now deal with that part of section 9 which was inserted by the committee, and which relates to purchases by common carriers and the like. I come immediately to that part of the section which relates to what is known as an interlocking directorate, and I beg to read it to the Senators who are here because I do not believe all of them comprehend just what it means:

That from and after two years—

That is, this does not take effect for two years—

From the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations, any one of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887.

I think the section very wisely excludes common carriers, because they ought to be dealt with elsewhere.

If—

Now, mark—

That means, practically, that if a consolidation of the corporations would be a violation of the antitrust law, then interlocking directors are made unlawful. That is nothing more than reiterating the antitrust law in a very weak form. We can not strengthen the antitrust law by declaring a proposition such as I have just read. It ought to be unlawful for corporations that are engaged in competitive business to have a community of directors. It ought to be unlawful for any man to act as a director upon two corporations which are or ought to be competing with each other; and we should make the same change with respect to the standard here that I have already suggested with regard to one company holding the stock of another.

I fear that the provision we found in this bill as it came over from the House is simply keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. If we have to prove that a consolidation of the two corporations which are involved would be a violation of the antitrust law, we do not need any additional regulation of this sort. I want the regulation to go much farther and declare that if they are engaged in competition, if they are doing the same kind of business—and I am quite willing to take some form of language that expresses that idea—then there must not be this community of directors, because the community of directors does destroy, at least it must necessarily tend to impair, the freedom and independence of management, and thus destroy or greatly lessen the rivalry that should exist between them—a rivalry in which we find the protection of the people the only protection we have.

The only protection we can secure is the willingness of one seller to dispose of his product at a fair price, knowing that he has a competitor who will so dispose of it if he does not. If we lose that protection, we shall be compelled to resort to the power of the Government itself in fixing prices, and when we are compelled to employ the force of the Government in fixing the prices of all the commodities that we sell and use we will have entered the field of State socialism. For that reason those of us who do not want to resort to that power of the Government in protecting the people against the rapacity and the avarice of monopoly are so insistent upon preserving independence and competition.

Mr. President, I have now made what suggestions have occurred to me with regard to these several sections in the bill before us. With the spirit that animates all of them I heartily concur; with the form in which the spirit is expressed I can not wholly agree, and I have thought it my duty to lay before the Senate the result of some study of the whole subject in so far as it is covered in the legislation now proposed.

Mr. CLAPP obtained the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. My colleague [Mr. LODGE], who is in London, has recently given an interview on the subject of the purchase of vessels by our Government and upon the general subject of neutrality. His long service in Congress, and upon the Committee on Foreign Relations in particular, I think, entitles him to speak with some authority on this important subject. I should like to have his interview read and incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. I suggest to the Senator that it was placed in the RECORD yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Chair is advised that a large part of the interview was inserted in the RECORD yesterday at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. WEEKS. I did not notice it. I was not present when it was done. I will look over it and see if it was entirely included.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hollis	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hughes	Owen	Sterling
Bryan	Johnson	Perkins	Thomas
Camden	Jones	Pittman	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thornton
Chilton	Kern	Pomerene	Vardaman
Clapp	Lane	Ransdell	Walsh
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Reed	Weeks
Dillingham	Lewis	Shafroth	West
Fletcher	McCumber	Sheppard	White
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Williams
Gore	Myers	Shively
Hitchcock	Nelson	Simmons

Mr. WALSH. I wish to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is my purpose to speak for only a few moments and to take as an illustration section 2 of the pending bill. I voted for the trade commission bill. I did it under a strong sense of doubt as to the effectiveness of that measure. In that measure we provided that unfair competition should be the test. I voted against the various efforts to define unfair competition, because wherever the attempt is made the effort always had to conclude with the general statement that it shall not exclude anything else that is unfair competition.

I realize, as everyone must, that all government must be a government by man. There never was and, of course, there never will be such a thing on earth as a government by law, in the sense of an abstraction being the controlling force in human affairs. No matter how definite and plain we make legislation, there is still the twilight zone of discretion on the part of the individual who is called upon to enforce law, on the part of him who is called upon to interpret it, and on the part of him who is called upon to execute it. The weak point in government is the twilight zone of discretion. But it is necessary that there should be a certain amount of discretion vested somewhere. However, I believe that we should make law just as explicit as it is possible to make it, leaving just as little as possible to the exercise of discretion.

Of course, as to the trade commission bill, if the men who are appointed on that commission are good men, and if they do the right thing, the measure will work out, but if all men were good and all men did the right thing we would have little need for legislation at all. All legislation, all government, is based upon the theory that there is an element of wrong which must be met and controlled by the broader equation.

I voted for that measure. My vote will not be necessary to the passage of the pending bill, but I for one will not vote for the pending bill if it is to be emasculated from end to end as it bids fair now to be served.

Mr. President, while the definition of "unfair competition" is, I believe, broad and sufficient if properly interpreted, what objection can there be to taking those things which we all agree clearly fall within the purview of unfair competition and prohibiting them, declaring a violation of the prohibition to be a crime, and seeking to punish the crime with a penalty? And to the extent to which we define any particular offense we withdraw that question from the judgment of the commission.

It is urged by those who are opposed to this plan that the moment we begin to specify certain things that moment we break down the effect of the broad definition in the trade commission bill; by specifying we exclude that which is not specified. That, of course, is a familiar rule of law, but that condition can always be met by providing that the specifying of certain things shall not be to the exclusion of those things fairly within the purview of the general prohibition and not specified.

So I see no earthly reason why we should not in this bill take an act which every one agrees to be an act of unfair competition and label it as an offense and prescribe a penalty for its violation, and from time to time as experience demonstrates that this act or that act is, beyond question and in the general consensus of opinion, an act of unfair competition place that act forever beyond the power of any commission to declare that it is not unfair, by Congress declaring it unfair and prescribing a penalty accordingly.

To illustrate—and I am going to use only one illustration—section 2 deals with what we call local underselling. Of course local underselling in the sense of a matter to be prohibited involves the question of transportation, but I shall not each time I use the term make that exception but refer to the subject, because we all know what local underselling means.

I think every Senator will agree that local underselling in the sense in which it is understood ought to be declared by the commission under the trade commission bill to be unfair competition. If so, then there can be no earthly objection to our making that declaration as a legislative declaration, thus removing it forever from any judgment of the commission. Under the broad authority of the trade commission to declare matters unfair competition, it would be very difficult, of course, to impose a penalty, but when we take a particular item and by congressional declaration make that an offense, there is no difficulty whatever in attaching the penalty.

I have listened during the last few days with a good deal of interest to the analysis pro and con of section 2. It has been broadly advocated by some, although I do not believe that it is a fair criticism upon those who have advocated it to say that they advocate it in relation to the detailed terms of section 2. They have advocated the broad proposition of making local underselling a crime and prescribing a penalty. On the other hand, those who have opposed it have not opposed it upon that broad ground but they have sought, and I think very successfully, to point out the defects and weaknesses of section 2 until that poor section has been tossed about here.

It seems to me that if, instead of pursuing this policy with section 2, we should first settle the question whether in the light of the broad authority of the trade-commission bill we should still go on and specify particular things and condemn them as unlawful, and, having settled that question, then, instead of tossing section 2 back and forth here until it is battered out of all possibility of recognition, take section 2 and perfect it.

I claim no authorship in what I am now about to submit. Some years ago I think the State of Iowa blazed the pathway by passing a law making it a crime to undersell petroleum products in that State. Iowa was followed by the State of Minnesota and was subsequently followed by the two Dakotas, I think by Nebraska, by Kansas, and if I am not mistaken Arkansas has a similar law. In most of these cases, especially in the case of Minnesota, with which I am more familiar, the prohibition went only to petroleum products and was, of course, limited to intrastate traffic.

A long hearing before our committee in 1912 upon that subject disclosed the fact that the independent dealers in petroleum oil in Minnesota practically found themselves in a position to defy the Standard Oil monopoly. Before that law was passed in Minnesota independent dealers tell me that it was impossible for them oftentimes to even get a right to build a warehouse upon the right of way of a railroad line; that they would make their arrangements with a superintendent perhaps and in a few weeks or months the superintendent would inform them that he was very sorry he could not carry out his agreement to give them a right to erect a warehouse on the right of way.

So complete a weapon was this simple, brief law in the hands of the independents of that State that after the law had been in operation and been sustained by the courts these independents no longer found it difficult to secure the privilege of a right to erect a warehouse. This law has run the gantlet of the courts, State and Federal, and has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, instead of treating section 2 to a sort of battledore-and-shuttlecock performance here, tossing it back and forth and puncturing it full of holes, showing the absolute want of provisions in that section that will be effective, instead of pointing out the defects in that section, it does seem to me, Mr. President, that the wise and sensible thing would be to adopt an amendment which has been tried and tested in the courts. At the proper time unless some other Senator offers the amendment I am going to offer as an amendment the bill which I introduced a year or two ago upon this very subject, which is the Minnesota law enlarged to cover all products and apply to interstate commerce. After referring to the trade in interstate commerce it reads:

That any person, firm, etc., * * * that shall, intentionally or otherwise, for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor or creating a monopoly in any locality, discriminate between sections, communities, or localities by selling a commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or locality than is charged for such commodity by said party in any other section, community, or locality, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the actual cost of transportation from the point of production if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture if a manufactured produce, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Mr. President, that is all practically that I care to say. I shall briefly close with urging the adoption of this or some equally plain provision.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. In just a moment. I shall not analyze the other sections. I believe that they, too, should be dealt with in the same plain manner in which I propose to deal with section 2. Instead of having a law here that is full of loopholes, instead of having a law here over which men upon this floor contend as to the meaning of the law, in a case where a law has been tried, tested, and worked out by the courts, why not adopt the simple process of incorporating it in this bill so far as it goes.

I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator if his proposed amendment would carry a jail sentence? Has it a criminal feature in it?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator did not refer to that in his explanation of the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I took it for granted in view of the controversy in which we had taken part it would be assumed. I read section 2 of the bill I propose to offer as an amendment:

SEC. 2. That any person, firm, company, association, or corporation violating any of the provisions of the preceding section, and any officer, agent, or receiver of any firm, company, association, or corporation, or any member of the same, or any individual found guilty of violation thereof shall be guilty of misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, as the court may determine.

Mr. KENYON. I understand the Senator proposes to offer that as a substitute for section 2.

Mr. CLAPP. Unless some Senator more directly connected with the committee will offer it. Of course, I would prefer that some member of the committee should offer it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have listened with much interest to the Senator, as I have listened to other eminent lawyers in this body in the discussion of this bill. The Senator frankly says that there is not any agreement on the part of the lawyers of this body as to what the bill means. I want to ask the Senator if it has ever occurred to him that those of us who are not lawyers must be in a quandry as to our duty in the matter of voting upon this measure?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it has. It has often seemed to me that if I were a layman, unable to satisfy myself from my own knowledge and study of the law as to what some of these measures mean which are rushed through this body, I would feel very much like declining to take the responsibility of voting upon them.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he ever saw a group of lawyers who could agree upon anything?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think they are in the same predicament that doctors are in. It is an axiom, "When doctors disagree, who shall decide?"

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe it is an indictment against a measure that lawyers can not agree upon what the terms may mean.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the same time it does leave those of us who are trying conscientiously to vote upon these bills, which are said to be of the gravest importance, in a position where, I think, as the Senator from Minnesota suggests, we might well be excused from voting upon them at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator from Minnesota takes his seat I should like to ask him if he can recall any measure of importance upon which the lawyers of this body have agreed, either during this Congress or any other Congress?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly; scores of them; so many of them coming under the rule of evidence that where everybody believes a man you are not called upon to present to the court a witness who does believe him.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have given some attention to the debates in this body, running through a series of years, and particularly as regards important measures of legislation; and I can not recall a single instance in which a certain construction has commanded the general approval of all the lawyers of this body. They differ, and very properly so, upon the construction to be given to language, and also as to the effect of measures when enacted in the phraseology in which they are presented for consideration. That is a common infirmity of the human mind.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the fact is that in most cases if time were taken and if there was an agreement as to what was desired as the ultimate of legislation there would be no difficulty whatever in framing language that would convey that thought. I undertake to say that of all litigation upon contracts—and there is a vast amount of it—there is a very small percentage of such litigation which involves a difference as to the meaning of the contract, because the lawyer drawing them takes time to prepare them. Of course, there are such cases. The trouble with us here is that we differ as to the language we use in framing law in the very act of framing the legislation itself, when we should take time to first determine what we want as the ultimate of legislation. Then, lawyers would have little difficulty, and laymen would have little difficulty, in framing language to express what they thus desire.

The trouble right here to-day with this very amendment is a confusion of purpose. While there are those who criticize the amendment, some of whom desire some amendment, there are others who believe that having put into the trade commission bill the broad definition of "unfair competition" there ought to be nowhere in the antitrust legislation a particular form of unfair competition defined. It is not so much a question of construction as it is a disagreement. With that disagreement overshadowing and running through the argument, of course, there is difficulty in reconciling the terms and expressions used.

Here, in this particular instance, is a law that has now stood for ten or a dozen years, which has run the gantlet of the courts, and which has proved a most effective weapon in the hands of the independent oil dealers in my State and in other States; so it does seem to me that instead of dealing with new, obscure, misleading, and, I think, perhaps in some instances, language affording a loophole, we should adopt a measure, where we can adopt one, that has been tried and tested.

I could go through the other amendments, but it is not my purpose to discuss at length this bill, for that has been done by others. I have simply presented this as an illustration of what might be done with section 2. I appeal to the Senate that if section 2, in any form, is to remain in the bill—and for one I am certainly in favor of retaining it—instead of our taking time in finding fault with it and pointing out loopholes in it, that some member of the committee offer an amendment which he thinks will cure its defects. If no member of the committee does so, I shall take the liberty myself at the proper time to offer the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. STERLING. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to say that as I understand his proposed amendment it relates simply to discrimination in selling and does not include discrimination in buying?

Mr. CLAPP. My amendment simply relates to selling. It deals with one plain, concrete proposition. Let us deal with these propositions, if it takes all summer, one at a time, to the end that when we get through we at least will feel that we know what we have put into the bill.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he would not be willing to include in his proposed amendment a prohibition against discrimination in buying as well as in selling, so as to include both in the same provision, in order that the language would read, if the Senator will excuse me——

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. STERLING. Something like this:

A provision prohibiting the purchasing at a higher rate or price or the selling at a lower rate or price of any such article or commodity in one State, section, community, or city than is paid or received for such article or commodity in another State, section, community, or city after equalizing distance and freight rates for the purpose of destroying or which is calculated to destroy the competition of any regularly established producer, manufacturer, or dealer in such article or commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person who in good faith attempts to become such producer, manufacturer, or dealer.

Might not the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Minnesota include the discrimination in buying at the higher or exorbitant price for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor as well?

Mr. CLAPP. Well, I confess the additional matter the Senator suggests has come up without much previous thought, and I do not exactly see how the local dealer could effectuate the destruction of competition by paying more for an article.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, that in both North Dakota and Montana they have a statute providing against discrimination in buying. I think it can be seen that a situation may arise where the buyer of a commodity may at a particular place pay a much higher price than the market price for the purpose of crowding out a competitor in the purchase of that commodity, and that there is perhaps nearly as much danger arising out of a condition of that kind as there would be from discrimination in selling at a lower price. In any event, in those two States they have included discrimination in buying as well as discrimination in selling.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CLAPP. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. STERLING. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that, after all, it would be a little better to define the acts which constitute unfair competition than to leave it to the trade commission to decide what is unfair competition. Therefore the Senator asks the question, "If the provisions of section 2 or a similar provision will apply to a particular evil, why not embody it in this bill? Also, why not embody the provisions of section 4 of this bill as a distinct specification of an evil against which we should guard and which we should prohibit?" If that be true, why might we not yet take some other recognized evil and add it to the list, as, for example, the following:

A provision prohibiting any contract or agreement for the exclusive sale, purchase, lease, or use of any such article or commodity as a condition for the sale or purchase, lease, or use of other required articles or commodities made for the purpose of destroying competition in the production, manufacture, sale, or purchase of any such article or commodities, or where the effect of such contract or agreement is to destroy or prevent competition in such production, manufacture, sale, or purchase.

Of course, the reading of this provision implies that there should be used the apt words to connect it with the bill. I am simply reading a provision that covers the evil itself.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota is partly right with reference to my view and he is partly wrong. I do not think we could to-day, to-morrow, or, perhaps, in 50 years define all unfair practices; they will develop as we go along. Every effort to define unfair practices in the trade commission bill has had to conclude with the general broad statement "and any other act calculated to destroy competition," or whatever form the drafter of the bill used. So I think this definition should stand there. On the other hand, I quite agree with the Senator that if there is any well-known practice upon which there is a fair agreement of opinion that it is an unfair practice, we should by law prohibit that and take it out of the "twilight zone" definition power at the hands of the commission.

Mr. STERLING. With the Senator's permission, now I should like to call his attention to a couple of other provisions which I suggest, and then have his opinion as to whether or not with the two provisions just read and the two which I shall read nearly all the instances of unfair competition are not covered, and if we should not include them in distinct terms in the bill? I call attention to them. A provision prohibiting—

Any offer, promise, or agreement by any person made to or with any other person for any rebate, refund, discount, concession, or reward upon any condition, expressed or implied, requiring the exclusive dealing with any person in relation to any such article or commodity, the effect of which said offer or agreement, if complied with, will be to destroy or prevent competition in the production, manufacture, sale, or purchase of such article or commodity.

Of course, the words "article or commodity," wherever used in any of these provisions, refer to an article or commodity which is the subject of interstate trade or commerce.

I now suggest this further provision, which is to prohibit—

The employment and use for the purpose of destroying or injuring the competition of any producer, manufacturer, or dealer in any such article or commodity, of blacklisting, boycotting, or other like methods, including espionage or the use of detectives, and all threats, coercion, or intimidation having for their end the prevention of competition in the production, manufacture, sale, or purchase of any such article or commodity.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should want to take time to read and study the provisions which have just been read by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] before expressing an opinion on them. There are some things that are so plain that they require no discussion and no exception. For instance, I think that the holding by one corporation of the stock of another corporation engaged in the same business is so certain to lead to a stifling of competition that it should be prohibited without any use of the word "competition," without any reference to competition. I believe that local underselling is so plainly a method of destroying competition that we do not have to deal with it with much detail.

The two provisions which the Senator from South Dakota has just read are somewhat lengthy, and I would not want offhand to say that I would think the practices therein referred to ought to be prohibited in that form. My idea is that the things that we prohibit should be so plain that we should have no hesitation in prescribing the penalty, including, of course, imprisonment; whereas there might be a condition of affairs along other lines of activity where we could not with safety prescribe that penalty. I am, however, in hearty sympathy—in fact, it was the very purpose of my rising—with the proposition that those things that may be made plain, upon which we are generally agreed, should be prohibited. We should prohibit them, and then leave the commission with that territory to work in which we are unable to cover by specific cases.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota still yield?

Mr. CLAPP. I have concluded, unless what I have said is going to involve an inquiry. Otherwise, I will take my seat.

Mr. STERLING. I have no further inquiry to address to the Senator; but I should like to say, Mr. President, that it is just at this point that I differ, perhaps, from the Senator from Minnesota. He seems to realize that it would be well if we could define and describe the different acts which would constitute unfair competition and that there would be certainty in the law by following that procedure; but I can not agree to the proposition that the trade commission should have the power in the absence of such definition to determine what is unfair competition.

Let us take some of the illustrations that occur to us now and that have been referred to in this debate. For example, there has been no remedy for the party aggrieved or oppressed by local underselling for the purpose of destroying his business. There has been no remedy at law or in equity for the party aggrieved by the payment by his competitor of an excessive price. It was necessary in the State of Minnesota that a law be enacted in order that local underselling for the purpose of destroying a competitor should be prohibited.

It is perhaps true that in the State of South Dakota, as the Senator from Minnesota has suggested, the occasion for the law were the transactions of the Standard Oil Co. A case came to the Supreme Court of the United States under that law, the case of the State against Central Lumber Co., and the law was sustained; but without the law there would have been no remedy. Neither would there have been any remedy in any of these cases without express State statute. What follows as a necessary consequence? Without such statute the man who undersells for the purpose of destroying a competitor would be within his rights. If we put it in the power of a trade commission to say that local underselling or local overbuying or paying a higher price than the market price is unfair competition, or that exclusive leasing or purchasing is unfair competition, we are putting it into the power of the trade commission to make the law, because, outside of express statutory law, there is no remedy.

That is the fault that I find with section 5 of the trade commission bill. It is a pure delegation of legislative power to the trade commission; and, hence, I see the necessity of defining and saying in this bill or the trade commission bill what shall constitute unfair competition. I think the four provisions which I have read here, and to which I have called the attention of Senators, will include nearly every known form of unfair competition of which complaint has been made. The language is couched to some extent in general terms, especially in the last provision, and yet I think in such terms that we could not be charged with delegating legislative power to the trade commission.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to ask a question to obtain the Senator's view. Conceding that these practices were all enumerated, would not the Senator feel that general broad power should be given the commission to declare other acts unfair as they came under the observation of the commission?

Mr. STERLING. I hardly believe we can confer that power on the commission; as other evils appear it should be left to Congress to legislate concerning them. There would still exist the power on the part of the commission to supervise and to determine whether in this or that respect there had been a violation of the law as laid down defining the act which should constitute the offense.

Mr. CLAPP. The only difference between the Senator and myself is that I am in hearty accord—in fact, it is one of the things that I have been fighting for—with the effort to include in this bill those practices as to which there can be no question. Notwithstanding that, however, I would rather be inclined to think that the commission should stand, and then, as I said a while ago, as experience developed other things beyond question they should be the subject of specific legislation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I merely want to say, in conclusion, that it has been urged that we have a precedent for the power granted the trade commission in the interstate-commerce law and in the power granted various administrative and executive officers under acts of Congress, but I think a clear distinction may be found between the power conferred on the trade commission and the power conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a reasonable rate. I sought to point out that difference once before when the trade commission bill was under discussion in the Senate. I venture to say there is no authority in any decision, nor precedent in any statute either, for the powers conferred on the trade commission by section 5, by the terms of which we have given the power to prevent "unfair competition" without in any way defining what "unfair condition" is.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not at all sure that this continued discussion is inadvisable. While we seem to be taking considerable time, I am not at all certain that it is not well taken. The more I hear of this discussion, the more I contemplate the situation as it presents itself, the more I become satisfied that anything here which in any way may weaken or emasculate the Sherman antitrust law will work great detriment to the people.

I want, Mr. President, as somewhat of a text, to call attention to two or three general statements, not in my own language but in the language of those who speak by authority and who announce principles which, in my judgment, we are actually violating or are proposing to violate in one way or the other in this legislation. Mr. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, says:

> Everyone has a right to demand that he be governed by general rules, and a special statute, which, without his consent singles his case out as one to be regulated by a different law from that which is applied in all similar cases, would not be legitimate legislation, but would be such an arbitrary mandate as is not within the province of free government. Those who make the law are "to govern by promulgated established law, not to be varied in particular cases, but to have one rule for rich and poor, for the favorite at court and the countryman at plow." This is a maxim of constitutional law, and by it we may test the authority and binding force of legislative enactments.

Edmund Burke, the great English philosopher, said:

> They may be assured that however they amuse themselves with a variety of projects for substituting something else in place of that great and only foundation of government, the confidence of the people, every attempt will but make their condition worse.

A later authority and no less distinguished in the present day—I refer to President Wilson—said in a speech:

> I will not live under trustees if I can help it. No group of men less than the majority has a right to tell me how I have got to live in America. I will submit to the majority, because I have been trained to do it, though I may sometimes have my private opinion even of the majority. I do not care how wise, how patriotic, the trustees may be, I have never heard of any group of men in whose hands I am willing to lodge the liberties of America in trust. If any part of our people want to be wards, if they want to have guardians put over them, if they want to be taken care of, if they want to be children, patronized by the Government, why I am sorry, because it will sap the manhood of America. But I don't believe they do. I believe they want to stand on the firm foundation of law and right and take care of themselves. I, for my part, don't want to belong to a nation, I believe that I do not belong to a nation, that needs to be taken care of by guardians. I want to belong to a nation, and I am proud that I do belong to a nation, that knows how to take care of itself. If I thought that the American people were reckless, were ignorant, were vindictive, I might shrink from putting the Government into their hands. But the beauty of a democracy is that when you are reckless you destroy your own established conditions of life; when you are vindictive you wreak vengeance upon yourself; the whole stability of a democratic polity rests upon the fact that every interest is every man's interest.

Mr. President, no one will impeach the authorities from which I have quoted; no one, in my judgment, will find any fault with the principles announced. In other words, the duty of the legislature or the Congress is to prescribe general rules of conduct, general rules of law which relate to all who come within the purview of the law, and there should be no exception, so as to recognize within the terms of the law a class. Secondly, there is no safer foundation upon which to rest government than upon the people as a whole; in other words, they should retain within their control and in their power all the powers of government, simply calling into activity agents to carry into effect the prescribed rules which they have crystallized into statute. The people should never create a power or a commission without fixing definite bounds and prescribing with certainty the limit of authority to be exercised and fixing also the rules definitely by which it is to be exercised. Unlimited discretion is the beginning of arbitrary power and ultimately the rendezvous of corruption. Thirdly, as the President said, there is no group of men wise enough or sufficiently experienced to whom to trust the power, without having, through the people, prescribed the rules by which they are to be governed and the limitations of their power.

In 1890 we passed the law which we are now discussing from day to day, known as the Sherman antitrust law. When you come to examine its provisions in the light of the constructions which have been placed upon the law, it is a great statute. In my opinion, it is one of the greatest statutes which we have. It is one of those statutes as to which in making the makers builded wiser than they knew. The experience of years has demonstrated its wide-reaching compass and its effectiveness to accomplish what those who drafted it intended that it should accomplish.

What were the provisions? In the first place, there is a provision to the effect that the Government may go into court and enjoin the formation of these monopolies or combines to prevent their being brought into existence at all. Mr. President, if that provision of the law had been executed—and we are here dealing as legislators and not as executors of the law—very few of the 300 monopolies or trusts that are now in existence and to which our attention was called yesterday would be in existence now. It was not the fault of the law. It was sufficient and efficient. It was by reason of the fact that it was not executed.

We all know of instances in which it was advertised in advance that combinations were to be formed in which monopolies were made known to the public in advance of their creation. I have in mind a particular one, as no doubt you all have it in mind, in which for weeks before the monopoly was formed—a monopoly which the Government is now seeking to dissolve—the parties who created it informed the public, through the press and otherwise, of the nature of the combination, the details of the combine, and the entire compass and scope of the monopoly. The Government sat by and permitted it to organize, all the time having an efficient statute for the purpose of preventing it.

There was a second provision of the law providing for the criminal prosecution of those who might violate it. That is the one provision in the law which has disturbed the inner seat of judgment and consciousness of those who have been engaged in its violation. That provision of the law never has been enforced as it should have been enforced and as it could have been enforced. That provision has seldom been put into execution, and when attempted it has been enforced with much hesitancy if not tenderness. All kinds of influence, both direct and indirect, subtle and open, have been brought to bear upon the Government authorities to prevent calling into activity the criminal features of the law; and when nothing else would prevail we were advised through the public press and through the magazines and articles contributed to the patent insides of the newspapers that it would result in business disaster and financial crisis.

So, Mr. President, omitting the injunctive process, afraid to execute the criminal feature of the law, the people who wanted to violate it were practically permitted to have their own way, and when we did come to execute the provision of the law relative to the criminal feature of it we simply contented ourselves in most instances by imposing a fine. The result was that the fine was passed on to the consumer or the purchaser of the goods, and the corporations were not greatly disturbed.

Then we had the other process provided for in the statute—of dissolution of corporations, combines, or monopolies after they were formed. That has been called into service more than any other provision of the statute.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think the fact that that provision of the statute has been called into operation has produced any appreciable deterrent effect? I recall that the Southern Pacific and Union Pacific combination was sometime ago declared to be a violation of this law and a dissolution ordered accordingly; but to-day the New York Central Railroad Co. proposes to form a combination almost precisely like that which was thus dissolved, consisting of its own road, the Michigan Central road, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern road, and what is called the Big Four road; and the only opposition I have thus far noticed to this proposed combination—a clear and palpable violation not only of the statute but of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Southern Pacific case—is the effort on the part of some of the stockholders of the New York Central, who have appealed to the local courts to prevent it.

It seems to me that this is one of the instances in which the Government should see to it that the precedents which have been established by the Supreme Court in the matter of these combinations should be rigorously and inflexibly applied to all similar combinations that are proposed or that are now pending.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am discussing this matter on the proposition of finding an efficient law. I do not care to digress at length with reference to those who have had upon them the burden of executing the statute. My design was to limit myself to the question whether or not the statute is sufficient and efficient, if executed. I have no reason to assume that a different set of officers would be any more capable or any more efficient in executing a different statute than the statute which we have. I realize, and I think everyone realizes, that one reason for the nonenforcement of this law has been the fact that the public very generally considered that its execution would be possibly detrimental to the public interest. I am by no means sure that we are not now approaching in this country the time when, by reason of the influence which they exercise in elections and the power which they exercise in reference to selecting officers, monopoly in this country will go unrestrained in any way. It will not be, however, because there is not sufficient law to restrain it, but because we are placed in one of two positions—either we think it is unwise to destroy monopoly and prefer to let it have its reign and its control, or else they are in such powerful connection with the political interests of the country that they prevent its execution.

What I wanted to confine myself to, however, was the question whether or not we have an efficient statute, and the thing we are hunting for is some one to execute it. Now, it is true, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said, that in many of these instances the attempt to execute the law has been of no benefit to the public. Why? Because they stopped upon the hither side of doing what the law authorized them to do and what the public interest demanded that they should do if we desire to get rid of monopoly.

For instance, take the decision in the Tobacco case. There the Supreme Court of the United States decided that it was within the purview of this statute to have the products and the commodities of that great monopoly entirely excluded from the channels of interstate trade if necessary in order to effectuate its dissolution and its death. They said, furthermore, that it might be placed in the hands of a receiver and operated by a receiver in behalf of the public interest. There was no limit to the power which the Supreme Court authorized to be utilized and taken in order to be rid of this great combine and this great monopoly. I do not hesitate to say that, notwithstanding that drastic decision and the efficient means which were placed in the hands of the executive officers to act under it, to-day the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. are in practically as good condition as monopolies as they ever were. Why? Because we refused to execute the law. In saying this I do not raise the question of honesty of purpose. I prefer to consider it as an honest difference of opinion as to what was necessary to be done in order to effectuate a real dissolution. I have no doubt, indeed, that was true, but it must be conceded that if the dissolution was not complete, if the monopoly was not destroyed, it was not the fault of the law or the judgment of the court.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to suggest a thought to the Senator from Idaho. If it is true that the law now provides a means by which these iniquities and these injustices may be stopped, what use or what sense is there in Congress passing other laws to place in the hands of the same officials if they will not execute the ones which now exist? And if they are sufficient, why is not Congress, then, turning its attention to these officials and passing laws to force them to do their duty? Why would not that be the stroke of the sword which would cut the Gordian knot, and stop all of this interminable talk which is being dissipated on the thin air to aid measures which, in my opinion, only further befog the situation and render the laws less accessible as means of relief to the people of the country?

If it is a fact that there are laws upon the statute books and decisions from the courts by which this condition could be remedied under existing circumstances, why is not Congress, in the discharge of its duty to the people, taking measures to compel the executive department of the Government, if it is at fault, to do its duty, and aiming its laws there? That is the weak point in it. Why make more laws for them to fail to execute?

I should like to have the Senator from Idaho answer that question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should be willing to answer the part of the question which relates to why we should make more laws; but it would be a little embarrassing for me to answer the question why there should be any more of this "interminable talk," in view of the fact that I have the floor. [Laughter.]

The statute to which I have referred is our only protection in this country against the restraint of trade or against monopoly in interstate commerce. The great fundamental object and purpose of the statute was to provide for the freedom of trade, for the free flow of commerce between the different States of the Union, to relieve the channels of interstate trade entirely from the embarrassment or the injury which might arise by reason of monopoly in interstate trade. I want the Senate to bear in mind that that is the only statute we have for our protection in this country against the continued increase of monopolistic power and for the freedom of interstate commerce.

I say that for the reason that that being true, I would appeal to all men who do not want to see monopoly finally prevail in this country not to weaken the Sherman law at any point. All men who are opposed to monopoly, who see its fearful evils, ought to stand against weakening the law or excepting anybody from its operation. If we arrive in our economic development at a point where we think it is wise to take another course entirely, certainly we should repeal it as a whole, and make the repeal applicable to the entire people, the same as we should make the law applicable to the entire people.

I am not one of those, however, who believe the time has arrived when we are prepared to say that we will weaken our forces anywhere along the line. As I look at it, almost as tremendous a battle is on in this country for the individual rights of the citizen and for republican institutions under which we live as the great battle which is raging along the line between Belgium and France to-day. It is of a different kind of battle, to be sure, but it will finally have the same effect upon the institutions under which we live as would an invading foe. We should no more weaken our forces at any single point of attack than would the great generals in command of those battling cohorts weaken their forces at any point in order to enable the opposing forces to slip through.

It is unfortunate that men who are entirely sincere and perfectly intellectually honest in their endeavor to arrive at the same point should have different views as to the method by which we should arrive at that point; but it is one of the characteristics of human nature that men will differ, having the same integrity of purpose and the same object in view, as to the manner by which to accomplish it, and it is one of the unfortunate features of this debate. Perhaps, however, by a continued interchange of views we can come somewhere near the proposition of leaving the Sherman antitrust law without any assailment or any undermining or undersapping in any way, shape, or form. If we shall do that, I am not very particular about what other laws are passed in regard to it. I would gladly vote for any measure which would seem to strengthen it. I would gladly support any provisions which would seem to add force to it, although I have come to the conclusion, in listening to this debate, as I said a moment ago, that what we need most is the execution of the law rather than more laws.

Coming now immediately to the question which is before us, that is, the question whether we should take sections 2 and 4 and either eliminate them entirely from the bill, or, leaving them in the bill, eliminate the criminal provisions with reference to punishment, and place them under the execution of the trade commission. I have said all I desire to say upon the trade commission other than as to its applicability to this particular situation. Let us not forget, however, that the one thing for which the monopolists of this country have prayed from the hour the Sherman law was enacted until now is either the overlooking or the repealing of the provisions with reference to the punishment provided by the criminal features of the statute. Let us bear in mind that that is the one thing about which they have had most concern. I am not willing to take any provision of the Sherman law, or any features of unfair competition, or any monopolistic practice, and individualize it and single it out and put it into a statute by itself, without attaching to it a provision for punishment by either a jail sentence or a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary. And I am not willing to create a trade commission, whose mild jurisdiction will invite all monopolists to seek its favors and which will, in its practical working, have a tendency to discourage the enforcement of the Sherman law and lead ultimately to its being treated as a dead letter.

If we are going to undertake to subdivide the elements which constitute unfair competition or restraint of trade or monopoly in order to make them plainer and more specific and more easily enforced, let us not feed the public mind upon the proposition that so far as the criminal law is concerned it ought to be eliminated entirely from the Sherman law.

Therefore I am heartily in favor of restoring sections 2 and 4 and restoring the provisions with reference to punishment as they came from the House.

The Senator from Iowa has said, and I think said with some force and effect—I know it produced in my mind a different line of thought from that which I had before—that sections 2 and 4 are to a certain extent uncertain and ambiguous. It may be so. I do not care to debate that question with him; but the principle contained therein, as said by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], is against the cutting of prices in localities; and the other principle in section 4 is one that is well known. We speak of them in a general way, and we can take those general principles and shape them in proper language so that no man may be mistaken as to what they mean, and leave attached to them a punishment for those who shall violate them.

Therefore I would beg those who are opposed to sections 2 and 4 to lend their splendid abilities to eliminating the ambiguous language therefrom, if any therein there be, instead of attacking them as a whole, or taking from them the punishment which is therein provided for. I do not think they are so vulnerable to attack for ambiguity as my friend from Iowa thinks, although I greatly respect his judgment upon these matters.

For instance, take the question of intent, which was referred to. The bill says here:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale, * * * with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor.

I do not think there is any trouble about proving that purpose or proving that intent. You prove the facts, and then you apply the principle that every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences which flow from his own act. If you find A in charge of a vast territory, and B operating within a portion of that territory, and you find that A lowers the price in the immediate region of B and keeps his price up in all the rest of the territory, and you prove that fact, you will have no trouble in satisfying a jury as to his purpose or as to his intent. I can scarcely conceive of any transaction where, if the probative facts were before the jury, there would be any difficulty in arriving at the intent or the purpose of the party who was violating the law and against whom the charge was laid.

Be that as it may, however—I do not think that is a difficulty, but be that as it may—we ought not to assail the entire section, nor section 4, by reason of the ambiguity which is claimed to be in those sections:

> Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold.

Mr. President, I have no doubt but that the trade commission would have to take all those things into consideration in determining unfair competition, and that they would take all those things into consideration; so there is no larger discretion rested there than would be rested in the trade commission. It is said, however, that in the trade commission bill there is no punishment provided, and therefore that we do not need to be so specific and so certain in our language. Quite true; but it is infinitely better that we engage our attention in being specific in our language and certain in our expressions, and retain the criminal or punitive features of the statute, than to turn it over to a trade commission, wherein the only punishment will be the issuing of an injunction without cost or expense to the violator of the law.

I think it a wise rule that you make the man who violates the law pay for the violation. I think it a wise rule that you impose upon him the cost of the prosecution. What are we doing here, however? We are not only eliminating the criminal and punitive features of the statute, we are not only eliminating the specific provision, but we are going further and providing a modus operandi by which there can be no possible punishment even in the way of punitive damages. Why, Mr. President, if I had a monopoly in this country, and were in fear of the judgment of a court or the verdict of a jury, if I felt that in all probability I had violated the law and might be punished, I would welcome with open arms a change in the law which would take away the punishment and simply turn me over to the mercies of a restraining order issued by some court. We may technically interpret this matter as we will, but take my word for it, just as fast as you eliminate the punitive features of these statutes from the law that you are enacting to-day, the juries and the courts of this country will eliminate the punitive features of the Sherman antitrust law. Our complaint has been that the juries have refused to convict, and we criticize them here upon the floor of the Senate for refusing to convict, and yet we add to the popular opinion and help to make up the public sentiment against conviction by enacting a law here and eliminating all possibility of punishment.

What are those who are violating the law getting under this change of program? First, they are securing some other method than the Sherman law to pass upon their conduct, because that is what will, as a practical proposition, happen in the end. Second, they are witnessing the discouragement of criminal prosecution under the Sherman law. Third, they are assured that the public will pay all expenses, and they are relieved not only from punishment but from costs. Fourth, they secure a commission whose membership merely they have to control in order to control the situation.

Mr. President, let us reflect for a moment. This is a day of propaganda for popular government, for placing the Government more and more in the hands of the people, for turning the powers of legislation and the power of the control of the executive more completely over into the hands of the masses. That is what we tell them. What are we doing? We have to-day the transportation system of this country almost completely in the control and under the control of a commission which the people can neither select, elect, or recall. We have the currency of this country in the control of a commission which the people of the country can neither select, elect, recall, or prevent from being appointed. We have now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill providing that there shall be placed in the hands of a commission at Washington the power, capacity, and the great instrumentalities which are to turn the wheels of industry in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We are now proposing to place all the great industries of the country in the hands of a commission which the people neither select, elect, nor can they recall. We leave a mere shell of the Government, the mere outward form of the Government, in the hands of the people to flatter and satisfy their pride, while the great essential elemental powers which deal with and control their destinies are in the hands of 25 or 30 men.

What chance will the great mass of the American people have in controlling those 30 men when 25 years shall have rolled around? We have had some observations passing before us, and we know that it would be within the power of any one man to turn these great industries and the entire business, currency, and transportation of the country over to a class of men whose view of unfair competition or whose view of a proper currency might be as far removed from your judgment or mine as the light from the darkness. Who is going to check up on it? Where is the countercheck? What becomes of that principle, the principle which has preserved the Government until this day, that in no man's hand is lodged arbitrary power, that the executive is balanced against the legislature, and the legislature against the judiciary, and one against the other? What becomes of that great fundamental principle discovered by our fathers practically and put into the Constitution of the United States when you have the vast powers which are delegated to these men without any check or balance or recall or review whatever?

Mr. President, I am not expressing my view with any expectation whatever of changing the current or changing the program. I understand perfectly how utterly useless it is to prophesy except to satisfy your own intellectual activity, but just so sure as the American people discover, and as soon as they do discover, that we are delegating these vast powers to those with whom they have no political connection and over whom they have no elective control, the program will be changed.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the restoration, if I get a chance, of section 2. I have already voted for the restoration of section 4. I shall vote to sustain the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to restore the punitive features of the statute, and I will look forward with pleasure to the time when, not so far ahead, I shall vote to repeal section 5 at least of the trade commission bill. For at no distant day business will awaken to the fact that it is bound around and clamped down by bureaucracy, and the people will awaken to the fact that while discussing primaries, the initiative, the referendum, and recall that the real powers of Government, that those powers which deal with their every interest, have been safely stored in the hands of a few men who neither derive their authority from the people nor are they answerable to them. When that awakening comes, the program of moddened bureaucracy will have an abrupt and ignominious end.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a moment of time to revive in the memory of my colleagues on this side of the House a recollection and the recollection of such Senators on the other side as may be interested in the matter to a parallel to the motion of the Senator from Missouri. I take this from the history of the time, as I was not present and was not honored with a seat at the time of the occurrence. I speak to my own colleagues to remind them when the issue was made before this country and I participated in it in convention and afterwards on the stump, as we refer to our efforts in the matter of election. I shall unveil and say that my purpose is largely political and partisan. I do not wish to have my party left in a position in which a parallel subject may be created against it in this coming campaign to its confusement, nor do I wish my honored opponents to be in a position of advantage against my own party upon so serious a matter whether we will punish the violators of law or give them immunity under what appears to be a punishment, but is a mere specious device to evade one.

As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, it revolves upon this single solitary distinction. If men do acts which are of themselves criminal in their effect upon the public, are we to hope to avoid that effect immediately through the agency of a court of equity which might redress these acts if they can be ascertained in time or advised of, or shall we menace the mind of the offender with a consciousness that if he does such act he will be a criminal and that he will be punished as such?

Second. Will we give to the public the security in their minds that people who commit crimes against them for their private welfare will be treated as much as criminals as the ordinary individual will be treated should he commit similar crimes against those larger individuals?

Mr. President, in this honorable body some years past there was a motion made by a very able Senator which passed into history to strike from a bill pending, referred to as the rebate act, sometimes as the Elkins Act, that portion of the penalty which created imprisonment and prescribed the jail for the offender. After debate and consideration in this body the motion prevailed, and there was left nothing in the measure that threatened the offender with either jail or the penitentiary, but there was continued a form of punishment in shape of fine.

Promptly the individuals proceeded to violate the law, would be found guilty or wherever they chose would plead nolo contendere, and would pay some fine, and promptly by that process, to be admired for its circular ingenuity yet greatly to be condemned for its pernicious activity, they as promptly levied the amount of that fine in increased rates of some nature upon the public and made the public pay that fine assessed against them.

The Democrats made an issue in our platform declarations upon this extended favoritism on the part of our honorable opponents who were then in charge of the Senate in striking out every form of punitive punishment under that rebate law and substituting in its stead the fine. We charged that it was an evasion and a trick which while it gave to the public mind the idea of a penalty it clearly increased the opportunity of the offender to oppress the public without fear and without punishment.

Sir, I am strongly impressed with the idea, indeed I am impressed with the fact, that if we shall now duplicate the very conduct which we condemned on the part of our honorable opponents we will make ourselves ridiculous before men of intelligence and contemptible before those who will view us as hypocrites. That there will be a very large body of our citizenship who will come to the conclusion that we have been induced to this new departure because of an advantage to be gained from certain corporate offenders in the coming political campaign.

I mention these things because they impress me. They operate upon my mind, they appeal to my nature sensitive. The fact that our honorable opponents would have a right to take an advantage of our folly. I present it to my own side of the Chamber that they may recall the past history of a few campaigns back and realize what position the Progressive Party could rightfully put us in before the Nation if we allowed this blunder to be committed in the Senate while we are supposed to be in charge of the Government.

The political aspect and more the confessed partisanship of this phase I do not disguise and which I promptly and frankly avow.

Next, Mr. President, if there had never been an expression in the bill that carried with it the suggestion of a penalty and the ordering of personal punishment of the violator it might be argued here that we would be granted full exemption from having had any personal or political object in now placing such in the act or in not introducing the section. But here we have it that heretofore in the measure there was a provision that prescribed a penalty of punishment and that it was afterwards taken out of the law. That thereafter an effort again was made to put such back in the law, yet such was by us defeated. Sir, there will blaze before our eyes from the startled public the senseless interrogation, Why?

If in the beginning the wisdom of such provision was so paramount, the justice of it so apparent, the rightfulness so undisputed that at the time of its being shaped the President sent his suggestions of a form of a measure, and this form of remedy was regarded not only appropriate, but necessary, the question will be, What was it that operated upon the mind that made you Democratic Senators reverse the ruling power that dominated at that time and to strike from the measure the punishment that was prescribed, and then, in order, to accentuate the object you had—whatever it was—hidden from public view, to decline deliberately when the matter was brought to your attention to reinstate it? We will have difficulty, as I view it, my fellow Senators, in defending the accusation that there was a questionable purpose behind it all, unrevealed to the public mind. We can not very well stand before the public, as I see it, justifying, if you please, the punishment of the small offender upon the ground that the law should be universal and have no exemption, by favor or fear, sending the small man to jail, as he has been sent, for the mere violation of an injunction, which, if he were a toiler, a laborer, he seldom knew the meaning of, and oftentimes was absolutely unconscious that he was the subject of it, nor can we take that other small individual who violates the penal laws and send him to the penitentiary and yet take the larger offender, whose offense extends itself in effect over the whole community, visiting different forms of persecution upon the body politic at large, and allow that individual complete immunity and exemption from the penal clause, allowing him only to be resorted against by equity features of the law. It would open us to the charge of a form of favoritism of law I fear would be difficult to justify. It would bring us to that position described by the able Senator from Idaho in the quotation he used, "that he had laid a net to snare the weak and out of which the strong could break."

I merely rose to say I favor the restoring to the bill the provision that makes a felon of a criminal wherever he is and of restoring to the bill the feature that punishes as a criminal criminal acts by whomsoever committed.

Therefore I rise to give my support with these views to the motion of the Senator from Missouri, or from whomsoever the motion may come, that has for its object the reinstitution of the measure that makes a penal offense a criminal conduct of that person or corporation that would violate these laws which seek to preserve the public from oppression and the citizen from persecution.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] frankly says that he discusses this question from a partisan viewpoint. I think partisanship sometimes becomes patriotism when it involves the discussion of a measure in harmony with the best interests of the public.

There is less excuse to-day for striking out this provision than there was in the case of the Elkins bill. In that case the law was dealing with rebates; mere clerks were largely employed, and a great many people who were interested in suppressing rebates felt that, inasmuch as the act was usually the act of a clerk, it would be impossible to secure conviction. If there can be a difference between two wrongs or two mistakes, this would even be a greater wrong or a greater mistake than that, because not only was that consideration urged at that time but now we have the experience of the past. In view of the advancement we have made, it seems to me there can be no justification whatever urged for eliminating the penal provisions from this measure.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest that there be submitted to the Senate the pending amendment—the amendment of the committee, presented by the Senator from Montana, to section 9b.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from Montana on the authority of the committee.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator from Texas asked to have it reported.

Mr. CULBERSON. No one took the floor, and I suggested that the amendment be presented to the Senate for its action.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] presented a substitute for a portion of section 9b, relating to the enforcement of section 9b. I moved, as an amendment in the form of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, to insert in lieu of that language the following language from section 4. I read it from section 4, but of course I am not offering it in connection with section 4. I am offering it as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Montana. That language is as follows:

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The point I am desiring the opinion of the Chair upon is whether my motion to substitute that language for the language tendered by the Senator from Montana is not now in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Without reference to the parliamentary situation, without reference to the question presented by the Senator from Missouri, I suggest that the substitute has no connection with the proposition that is pending before the Senate. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri has no logical relation to the subject matter of the committee amendment. The Senator can have an opportunity when we reach section 4 again to present the question which he seeks to present now. The Senate can do it by voting down the Senate committee amendment, which is to strike out section 4, but we ought not to introduce in section 9b what ought to be in section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas make a point of order against the proposed substitute?

Mr. CULBERSON. I make the suggestion to the Senator from Missouri that it would be more orderly and in accordance with the rules to present it when we return to section 4. It has no application to the pending committee amendment, which relates to section 9b.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that we ought to determine what we are going to do with sections 2 and 4 before we pass upon the amendment of the Senator from Montana. If we are to leave sections 2 and 4 as they are, there are a great many who might vote for the Senator's amendment who would not otherwise desire to do so.

Mr. CULBERSON. Section 2 has been stricken from the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Section 4, then.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment which struck out section 4 from the bill has been reconsidered, and the Senate is now considering the Senate committee amendment to section 9b. I will say to the Senator from Missouri there is no disposition not to return to section 4 at the proper time.

Mr. BORAH. Why would it not be proper on the part of the chairman to return to section 4 before we dispose of this amendment, because the disposition of section 4 will have much to do with my vote, as far as I am concerned, with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I make this suggestion? I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggested the right course. There is nothing inconsistent between the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri. We are entirely content to attach a criminal punishment to a violation of section 2 if that be retained in the bill and at the same time permit the civil remedies to be enforced through the action of the commission. Personally I am in favor of that and have been from the beginning. I think there ought to be a criminal penalty attached to section 2, but at the same time I believe that the commission ought to have the jurisdiction to enforce it civilly as well and prevent in that way the occurrence and recurrence of the offenses there stated exactly as we do in the antitrust law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to accommodate myself just as far as I possibly can to the mode of procedure desired by the chairman of the committee. The difficulty is that we are now dealing with section 9b. We have passed over section 4 and the first provision of section 9b is as follows:

That authority to enforce compliance with the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act by the corporations, associations, partnerships, and individuals, respectively, subject thereto is hereby vested: In the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows.

Then follow some 11 lines, and at the end of those the amendment of the Senator from Montana is to be inserted in lieu of other language.

Now, in view of the fact that the section expressly provides that the method of enforcement shall be through the trade commission, it, of course, raises the question whether that is to be the method of enforcement or whether it is to be enforced under the criminal laws of the State or the Nation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In one moment. If one can suggest a way by which we can deal with these subjects one at a time, I shall be glad to follow it. It seems to me that the right thing to do is to now recur to section 4 and settle section 4, and having settled it we will then know how to settle section 9b. I believe we would save time by doing it, because the debate has been centered around section 4. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that we ought to have no great degree of apprehension about the particular amendment which is now before the Senate. If the amendment is adopted, then the question will be as to whether section 9b as amended shall be adopted, and when it is then the question that the Senator is troubled about will be presented, namely, as to whether the law should be enforced by penal provisions or through the trade commission. It is a matter utterly irrelevant to the question which is now before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. Let me make one statement, and then I will yield.

I desire at this time to make a statement that I intended to make this morning. It seems that on yesterday in discussing the general features of this bill I left the impression on the minds of some, at least, that I was in effect charging that the Senator from Montana by bringing in this particular amendment was also seeking to strike out the criminal features of the bill. Nothing was further from my thought than that. I want it understood that the Senator from Montana in bringing in this amendment was only endeavoring to apply to the bill the method of procedure which had been already adopted in the trade commission bill. So nothing I have said could be taken as a criticism of the Senator from Montana. I make that statement because I think I ought to make it. I yield now to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply rose to make one suggestion. The very beginning of section 9b, which the Senator from Montana seeks to amend, relates to sections 2, 4, 8, and 9, and I think before we amend that section we ought to determine whether sections 2 and 4 are in the bill. At present, as I understand the situation, they were stricken out of the bill; they are not in it. I think we ought to determine, in the first place, whether sections 2 and 4 are restored to the bill before we pass upon this amendment. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that he temporarily lay his amendment aside until we can pass on that question.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Minnesota is incorrect in one respect. Section 2 has been already stricken from the bill. Section 4 was stricken from the bill, but a motion has been made and adopted to reconsider the action in reference to section 4, and it is now pending, with the Senate committee amendment to it. The immediate question, however, as I said a while ago, is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], for the Committee on the Judiciary, to section 9b. I have not, speaking for the committee, any desire to prolong this tangle, and am willing to return to and to have the Senate consider the committee amendment to section 4.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think that would be a very happy solution and that we would get along faster.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me, Mr. President, then, that the first question in reference to that is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CULBERSON. That motion has already been adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. That motion has been carried.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senate to return to section 4 and consider the Senate committee amendment to that section, which is to strike that section from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the Senate will return to the consideration of section 4.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that brings up the question, Shall section 4 be stricken from the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, was not a motion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to perfect section 4 before it is stricken out? It seems to me his motion would be in order before the question to strike out the section is put.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana has no amendment addressed to section 4. His amendment is proposed to be offered to section 9b.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood the Senator intended to offer that amendment, but I thought the Senator had another amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I propose to offer an amendment to the bill which will take the place of section 4.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest that the motion to reconsider the vote by which section 4 was stricken from the bill has been adopted, that that section is now before the Senate for consideration, and that the committee amendments to that section should properly be considered? Among those amendments is a proposal to strike out the criminal provision.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Iowa does not state it exactly correct, I think. The pending Senate committee amendment is to strike section 4 from the bill entirely.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that motion has been reconsidered.

Mr. REED. That has been reconsidered and is now renewed. There was a motion to strike the section out, which was agreed to; that has been reconsidered and now is renewed and is before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the question now is whether it shall be stricken out?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is whether section 4 shall be stricken from the bill altogether.

Mr. CUMMINS. Altogether?

Mr. CULBERSON. And remit the question to the trade commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not altogether remit it to the trade commission.

Mr. NELSON. I entirely agree, if I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] correctly, with his suggestion, and that is that before the motion to strike out section 4 shall be put any amendments that may be offered to perfect it must first be considered.

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the parliamentary situation, Mr. President, I have an amendment to send to the desk. I do not understand that, however, to be the case. The committee has an amendment to strike out section 4, and the committee has another amendment to substitute something in lieu of section 4. It occurs to me that parliamentarily the motion to strike out is the motion now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of a different opinion in regard to that. The Chair is of the opinion that the pending amendments to the section should be disposed of before the consideration of the motion to strike out the section. The question is now upon the first committee amendment proposed to section 4.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no doubt in my mind that there could be a motion made to amend section 4 by striking it out and by inserting other language in lieu of it. Then, after that language was offered to be inserted, we would have the privilege of perfecting that language before we voted upon the proposition. That, I think, is the fair way to put it. Now, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has a substitute which, while it does not suit me as well as the original section 4, yet, to a considerable extent, it covers matters which I desire to be covered. I should like the privilege, when that amendment is offered, of offering an amendment to it and taking the sense of the Senate upon that amendment. It seems to me that the proper motion is to strike out section 4 and to insert in lieu of it whatever amendment the Senator has to offer. Then we can have the privilege of perfecting that amendment if we so desire.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEST. In ordinary parliamentary practice it is always in order to first perfect a section which it is moved to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the question arises upon the first committee amendment, which the Secretary will state.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would it not be in order to propose a substitute for section 4? Then the question would finally recur on a motion to strike out, after the substitute is adopted or lost. If there is to be a substitute for it, there is no use of perfecting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section under consideration is section 4.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand; but suppose some Senator introduces a substitute for section 4 as a committee amendment—it would be a committee amendment, if it comes at all—I think it would be in order, because it is an amendment of the committee to strike out a provision of the bill and insert a substitute for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the matter would be more clear if Rule XVIII were read from the desk. That rule is very plain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XVIII.

AMENDMENTS—DIVISION OF A QUESTION.

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert. But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence. (Jefferson's Manual, secs. 35, 36.)

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the proposition—and I undertake to state it again—is this: The Committee on the Judiciary have reported an amendment that section 4 be stricken out altogether. There is no substitute at this time offered to section 4, but it is the purpose of the committee, if section 4 is stricken out, to move to insert in the bill a provision which will remedy the situation developed with reference to patented articles. That is the situation; and I respectfully submit to the Chair that the proposition now is the direct one on the proposed committee amendment to strike out section 4 altogether. There is no substitute offered by the committee for section 4, and we are only considering committee amendments at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, in response to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that it is a matter of perfect indifference to the Chair what mode of procedure is adopted; but the rule of the Senate is very specific, apparently, that before voting upon a motion to strike out motions to amend the part proposed to be stricken out shall have precedence. There are pending, as shown by the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, several of the proposed amendments to the section. If the committee withdraws those amendments and substitutes in place of them a motion to strike out, then the question would be upon the motion to strike out.

Mr. REED. But in the meantime any Senator could offer an amendment to perfect the text that is to be stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Chair will permit me, the Chair is absolutely right. There are pending amendments which must either be withdrawn or acted upon. When that is accomplished it is competent for any Senator to move to amend the text of the bill before a motion to strike out can be entertained. That is the way I interpret the rule, and I think it is right.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, at the risk of repetition, I desire to again state that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary does not propose at this time but one amendment to section 4, which is to strike it out altogether. It is true that certain amendments of the committee have been printed and are on the desk, though they have not been formally proposed to the Senate; they are simply in a shape to be proposed, if it seems proper to do so later on. So, I repeat that the only committee amendment with reference to section 4 is to strike it out altogether. I do not see how that can be amended. There is no proposition to strike out and insert at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas must be wrong in suggesting that the proposed amendments to the bill are on the table. They are printed in the bill; they are before the Senate for its action in some form or other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question about that. The report of the committee which is printed proposes various amendments to the section. The Chair, however, will recognize the Senator from Texas if he chooses to assume the responsibility, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, of withdrawing those proposed amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the committee has already in effect and substantially withdrawn the amendments to section 4, and in lieu of those proposed amendments moved to strike it out altogether. I can not make myself any clearer than that, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That being the case——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the motion to strike out and insert takes precedence of a motion simply to strike out. So the proper motion now is the motion to strike out and insert instead of a naked motion to strike out. Therefore, under that motion, the amendment proposed to be inserted in lieu of section 4 can be offered in that form.

Mr. CULBERSON. The answer to the Senator from Minnesota is that there is no motion to insert, but simply a motion to strike out.

Mr. NELSON. Well, a motion to strike out and insert takes precedence of that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought not to take a great deal of time with a question of this kind. It is true I have seen the Senate take a good deal of time over a point of order that could easily be gotten out of the way; but this rule is perfectly plain, and there is a reason for the rule. The rule reads as follows:

> But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

There is a reason for that. A provision in a bill may be absolutely defective and a motion to strike out would necessarily have to be voted for because of the defect, unless the right were reserved to amend and perfect the section before it was stricken out. Accordingly, the right is reserved to every Senator before a proposition is stricken out to perfect it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Missouri is addressing that statement to the Chair as a point of order, the Chair will state that he agrees with the Senator from Missouri, and will entertain a motion to perfect section 4 before putting the motion to strike it out.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, another inquiry. Section 4 has been reported here by the Judiciary Committee with the words—

> shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court—

Stricken out as printed; but I take it that they remain in section 4, unless a motion is made to amend section 4 by striking them out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment striking out those words has been withdrawn by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to amend section 4 by inserting in the first line of section 4, being line 13, page 4, the words "it shall be unlawful for," so that the section will read as printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I will ask whether the chairman of the committee has, on behalf of the committee, withdrawn all the amendments to the section which were reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. That being the case, unquestionably the motion of the Senator from Missouri is in order by way of perfecting the section before the motion to strike out is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Missouri if we can not have a vote on a motion to reinsert all of the language recommended to be stricken out? It is the Senator's purpose, as I understand, to restore all the language of the section which has been stricken out, and would it not be just as well to take a vote on all of it at once?

Mr. REED. I did not suppose I could make such a motion.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think there is anything in the way of that. I imagine no Senator would object. If necessary, I will ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. REED. Very well, Mr. President. I will make the motion in that form, if there is no objection. I move to amend section 4 so that it shall read as follows—I will ask the Secretary to read the section now exactly as it has been reported here by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, the Senator offers that as a substitute for the section?

Mr. REED. I am offering it so that it will read in that way for the purpose of perfecting it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri if he intends by his motion to exclude the part stricken out, beginning in line 25 on page 4?

Mr. REED. Probably that would be the effect of the amendment as I have stated it. Let me state it again. I move to amend section 4 so that it shall read as follows—and I will read it myself, and then I will get it right:

> SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from or rebate upon such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH. Let me remark to the Senator that the language he has read is entirely incongruous. If the words "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and so forth, are to be left in, then the language in italics in line 13, "it shall be unlawful for," is not necessary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will modify the amendment by striking out the words "it shall be unlawful for."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will pardon me, the phraseology should be changed in line 14. If the words "shall be unlawful for," in line 13, are stricken out, it will read:

> That any person engaged in commerce to lease.

Mr. REED. That is true. The words "who shall," in line 14, should be restored.

Mr. GALLINGER. Restoring the words of the original bill?

Mr. REED. The word "to," in line 14, should also be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on that, I desire to say just a few words. When the bill came before the Senate in the first place sections 2 and 4 were stricken out. Unfortunately the Senator from Missouri, who had some very positive ideas about these matters, was not present. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], in an accommodating spirit, made a motion to reconsider the vote by which those sections were stricken out. The Senator from Missouri on last Friday addressed himself to the Senate at considerable length upon the motion to reconsider, and the debate was resumed on yesterday. After it had gone on for some considerable time the motion was withdrawn with respect to section 2 but continued as to section 4, and by some arrangement, parliamentary in character, or otherwise, the nature of which I never was quite able to understand, the Senate passed to the consideration of section 9b, which relates to the method of enforcement of the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9, provided their enforcement is to be through the trade commission. I then offered an amendment, which had no bearing whatever upon the merits of either section 2, section 4, section 8, or section 9. The amendment proposed by me called for no consideration whatever of those questions. It was proposed upon the idea that if the enforcement was to be had through the trade commission, then it should be by a proceeding in harmony with the provision prescribed in the trade commission bill.

The reasons are of course obvious. Section 2 deals with one phase and aspect of unfair competition, as that expression is understood by the majority of the Senate, at least, in the trade commission bill. If therefore complaint were made of unfair competition by price cutting, charged as a violation of section 5 of the trade commission bill, the procedure before the trade commission would be after one manner. If, however, price cutting were charged in violation of the provisions of section 2 of this bill, the procedure would be before the trade commission, but by entirely different proceeding. I apprehend that no one would question that the two should be harmonized if that system is to go into force and effect at all.

I had little suspicion that it would provoke further discussion from the Senator from Missouri upon the merits of sections 2 and 4, but it did—and I do not mean to say that the debate has not been helpful—but in the course of the remarks of the Senator on yesterday it was declared that the attitude of those who are friendly to the excision of these two sections, leaving the matter of unfair competition and all phases and aspects of unfair competition to be dealt with by the trade commission, was taken in a spirit of either dread of or a tender regard for the great trusts guilty of outrageous practices destroying the efficiency of competition against them. The Senator even went on to say that the whole force and value of the general provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act were gone.

That argument was made when the trade-commission bill was here for consideration, but I do not recall that even the Senator from Missouri, who, as everybody knows, was exceedingly pronounced in his opposition to section 5, said to the country that we had emasculated the Sherman Antitrust Act by creating the trade commission.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose now to endeavor to repeat the absolute demonstration that was made in the course of that debate, that the Sherman Act is left in all its virility applicable to every case to which it has been made applicable in the past or may be by construction made applicable in the future. It was recognized, however, that there were many practices indulged in by business organizations that had not progressed so far in the suppression of competition as to constitute a monopoly, nor so far in the process of combination as to come within the denunciation of the provisions of section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The trade-commission bill was intended to deal with cases of that character, cases that could not be reached by the Sherman Act. But, Mr. President, in speaking about this matter on yesterday the Senator from Missouri discussed the provisions of sections 2 and 4 as though the trade commission, under the provisions of those sections, were going to deal with the occurrences that absolutely constitute the establishment of a combination in restraint of trade or an outrageous monopoly. Those provisions will be taken care of. Why, Mr. President, the Senator went for all his illustrations to cases determined by the Supreme Court of the United States and the other courts to be monopolies or combinations denounced by the Sherman Act. Those things will all be open to prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act just exactly the same as before. The Senator even went so far in that connection as to express the view that this side of the Chamber was obligated, by virtue of an express declaration in the platform of the party to which we belong, to put penal provisions in sections 2 and 4.

Now, the provision of the platform to which the Senator refers simply denounces the failure to prosecute, under the criminal provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, violations of that law, and certainly everybody upon this side will subscribe to the doctrine that the criminal provisions of that law ought to be enforced to the very letter against anybody shown to be guilty of violating its provisions.

Mr. President, we do not want to take those cases at all when we come to consider sections 2 and 4 of this bill. Sections 2 and 4 of this bill are intended to apply to practices pursued by organizations that can not be reached and to practices that can not be reached by any of the provisions of this act. In other words, when the practice goes so far as to be outrageous, as the Senator from Missouri on yesterday said, the probabilities are altogether that the case will fall within the provisions of the Sherman Act. He said to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on yesterday that he would undertake, under the language of the bill, to get a conviction in any case where there was an outrageous violation of the provisions of this bill. No doubt he would. We all recognize the ability as a lawyer as well as a legislator and the courage of the Senator from Missouri; but if there was a case of outrageous price cutting or an outrageous case of a tying-in contract it would undoubtedly be amenable to prosecution under the Sherman Act. It is not that kind of cases that we are trying to provide for at all.

So, Mr. President, when you come to prepare a law such as section 2 or section 4, and when you come to reflect upon the matter carefully, you will find that it is no easy task to frame it in such a way, to use such general language, as that it will reach the cases that really deserve to be punished by imprisonment or otherwise and yet not hamper and obstruct the usual and ordinary processes of trade.

I called your attention here the other day—and I do not want to repeat the argument—to considerations that will address themselves to almost everybody even upon the matter of price cutting, even upon the matter of the contracts referred to in section 4, that will be entirely legitimate, that no one can condemn in any way whatever. If they become outrageous, they are easily capable of prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act. If they are of the other character, doubtful as to whether or not they really constitute unfair competition, doubtful as to whether or not they are injurious to the public interests, the matter can be investigated and taken care of by the trade commission.

So it is not to be asserted that any of those who are advocating the relegation of this matter to the trade commission are troubled by any fears or that they are actuated by any particular concern or interest in the welfare of the great trusts that are found to be violating the law. It is deemed advisable to supplement the existing law by these additional provisions; and I do not quite understand how we would be justified in taking out of the operation of section 5 of the trade commission bill two particular phases of unfair competition and providing for them in another way, and leaving all other phases that are equally reprehensible to go unwhipped so far as penal provisions are concerned.

Mr. President, your attention was called in this discussion to at least a dozen different methods of unfair competition, including these two—price cutting and tying-in contracts. There are half a dozen that could be easily designated that are equally reprehensible. When we were considering that matter the Senator from Missouri over and over again declared that these things ought to be listed; that they ought to be specifically denounced. It was deemed unwise to do so, and this is along exactly the same line.

There is an honest difference of opinion as to the wisdom of the course that ought to be pursued. We ask that sections 2 and 4 go out, because they are already taken care of by the provisions of section 5 of the trade commission bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Montana appears to be of the opinion that in some way I cast some reflection upon him in the argument I made.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana does not entertain any such idea.

Mr. REED. The Senator evidently did not hear my statement, made within the hour, in which I rose and stated to the Senate that some impression had gotten about that I had so stated my objections to striking out the criminal phases of this bill as to leave the impression that the Senator from Montana was then endeavoring to do that by his amendment, and I stated that that had been farthest from my thoughts. I was standing within a few feet of the Senator, but I think he was engaged in conversation, and probably never heard it. If a duplication of that statement will settle that question, I have settled it.

I undertake to say that we are now at the very moment of determining the course of trust legislation in this country. We are at the forks of the road; and I shall discuss this question as I see it, without any thought of reflecting upon the views of others. In what I say let me in advance disclaim any thought of reflecting upon the views or opinions of others.

I assert it to be true that the policy of the Democratic Party and the policy of the Republican Party, if we can get it from their platforms, has been to denounce as criminal all combinations in restraint of trade, and that as time has gone on and as new devices and practices have developed these two political parties have insisted that those practices should be inhibited by specific statutory enactment, and that the criminal penalties of the law should be visited upon those indulging in the practices to which I have referred.

I shall not take much time in reading political platforms, but since my statement has been challenged I call attention first to the platform of 1908. I suppose the statute of limitations has not run against that great platform upon which we advanced the candidacy of the present Secretary of State. It reads:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. Among the additional remedies we specify three: First, a law preventing a duplication of directors among competing corporations; second, a license system which will, without abridging the right of each State to create corporations, or its right to regulate as it will foreign corporations doing business within its limits, make it necessary for a manufacturing or trading corporation engaged in interstate commerce to take out a Federal license before it shall be permitted to control as much as 25 per cent of the product in which it deals, the license to protect the public from watered stock and to prohibit the control by such corporation of more than 50 per cent of the total amount of any product consumed in the United States; and, third, a law compelling such licensed corporations to sell to all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms after making the allowance for the cost of transportation.

I can not read that as meaning anything other or different than that these particular practices were to be prohibited by positive law, and that it was intended that the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials should go on.

When I come to the platform of 1912 I find:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

Reading that just as a plain, common citizen would read it, I understand that it meant that the pains and penalties of the criminal law should be visited upon those who violate our present statutes, or who violate them as they shall be amended in accordance with the demands of this platform, for a little further along, and throwing a light backward upon the sentence I have just read, I find this:

> We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the disputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

We regret that the Sherman antitrust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

Then here are some specific things named in this section:

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

If I understand the human language, it was meant by this declaration to specify certain things upon which we were to legislate specifically, and not generally, and it was intended to invoke the criminal processes of the law to enforce those acts.

Mr. President, our Republican brethren also went on record. They said:

Experience makes it plain that the business of the country can be carried on without fear and without disturbance and at the same time without resort to practices which are abhorrent to the common sense of justice. The Republican Party favors the enactment of legislation supplementary to the existing antitrust act which will define as criminal offenses those specific acts that uniformly mark attempts to restrain and to monopolize trade.

If party platforms any longer have efficiency, if they have not become molasses to catch votes, if they are not mere subterfuges and frauds, then both political parties have bound themselves to single out these particular well-known practices of monopoly and to level against them the criminal prohibitions and criminal penalties of the statute. I do not know, in view of recent experience, whether or not one ought to be permitted to stand in this Chamber and invoke his fellow Senators of his own party to have regard for a platform pledge; but so far as I am concerned, believing that there may be yet some old-fashioned Democrat who believes that a party platform is a party contract, and that the good faith of the party is pledged to its redemption in every letter, syllable, line, and paragraph, I lay before that benighted, back-number Democrat the words of his party, the solemn pledge it made to the people.

Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] called attention to the President's message, written only on January 20, 1914, and sent to Congress as our guide, so far as the views of the Executive were concerned. There has not come to Congress any message repudiating a word or a line of this great state paper. Let me, therefore, call attention again, repeating what the Senator from Tennessee read, to this language:

Legislation is a business of interpretation, not of origination; and it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter. It is not recent or hasty opinion. It springs out of the experience of a whole generation. It has clarified itself by long contest, and those who for a long time battled with it and sought to change it are now frankly and honorably yielding to it and seeking to conform their actions to it.

* * * * * * *

We are all agreed that "private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," and our program is founded upon that conviction. It will be a comprehensive but not a radical or unacceptable program and these are its items, the changes which opinion deliberately sanctions and for which business waits:

* * * * * * *

The business of the country awaits also, has long awaited and has suffered because it could not obtain, further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

Mr. President, the President of the United States told us on the 20th day of January, in this great public document, that we had experienced for years and that there were now at least a large number of practices we understood, and that the time had come to specify those practices and to prohibit those practices specifically; and that is the last word we have from the President.

Are we going to redeem our platform? Are we going to answer to the call of the President in this message? Are we going to specify evils and provide penalties, or are we not going to specify evils and provide penalties? Are we going to give to the law that certainty which the President said business longed for and the country demanded?

It is no answer to the demand for specific legislation that you can not, by specific provision, cover every practice. Human ingenuity has exhausted itself for thousands of years in the endeavor to draw laws that would cover every criminal act, and yet we have never been able entirely to suppress crime. Human ingenuity can only do this: Following along the pathway of experience, when a wickedness develops and grows into a system, it can meet that system by a positive prohibition and by an appropriate punishment; and it is no answer to the man who seeks thus to meet a known evil that there are other evils that you may overlook. Such an argument as that is equivalent to saying that you should not capture one horse thief whom you can locate because, peradventure, there are other horse thieves you can not locate.

In our enactment of a statute it is our business at least to deal with the known evil, and that is what the House of Representatives sought to do. They sought to meet certain specific well-known devices of monopoly and to affix a penalty to them, just as we said in our platform we would do and just as the President demanded we should do.

I call your attention now to another thing. It was stated publicly that Congressman Clayton, who was appointed to a high judicial position, would not take his office because, at the request of the President, he chose to remain in his seat in Congress long enough to perfect this particular bill, and he sat there as the representative of the President—at least as the man in whom the President had special confidence—for some considerable time after his appointment to the bench, in order that he might complete this work and bring it here to Congress. He therefore was one of the men speaking, I think, for the President, who, in pursuit of the President's express recommendation, singled out certain practices that were well known and sought to meet those practices by a specific statutory provision. Among them was the practice referred to in section 4. It is one of the great devices, it is one of the old schemes of monopoly. There is nothing new about it. The road has been traveled until the ruts are worn in it so that the hubs of the wheels of monopoly in going over it drag on the ground at the side.

What is it? A man gets a patent. Some inventor sitting in his room, burning the midnight oil, and half starved, finally brings forth as the product of his genius some great improvement. Then some great manufacturer, observing this improvement, which has been patented, proceeds to buy up the patent, generally for a pittance. The policy of the law has been to encourage invention, and in order to encourage invention to give for a specified time the exclusive right to the owner of the patent to manufacture and vend the article. But that law implied and implies that the people are to be benefited. We promote inventive genius to the end that the people may have the benefit of the invention. Accordingly it was written into the law that the device must be manufactured.

Now, we find that the man who has bought this device, not content with his monopoly in that device, uses the special privilege the Government has given him for the purpose of building up a monopoly in defiance of law. Having this device, he says to every man who wants to use it, "I will not sell it to you unless you will also agree to buy from me all the other machinery I manufacture or all the supplies you may use upon this machine." I shall not drag the ground I went over the other day when I read you the decision of the Supreme Court and the opinion of the Chief Justice, in which both the court and the Chief Justice said this great wrong could be remedied alone by Congress. The Chief Justice stated in his opinion that one reason why he wrote the opinion was in order that he might make these statements for the benefit of Congress.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to call his attention to what the Committee on the Judiciary of the House say in their report on this subject?

Mr. REED. I should be very glad if the Senator would read it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will hand it to the Senator. He will find the parts marked on pages 8 and 9.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Tennessee, and I will read from the document:

But the advocates of this system and practice of monopoly, in dealing with this question, never look beyond the manufacturer or the local dealer to the millions of American consumers who are compelled to purchase daily the necessary food, raiment, and all the necessities of life through the ordinary channels of trade in their respective communities. What about the interest of consumers—the general public—the American people, as a whole? How do they fare under this unnatural arbitrary system and trade practice devised by American manufacturers and put in operation by great and powerful combinations in trade for their own enrichment and with the ultimate view of obtaining a complete monopoly in their special line of industry? Undoubtedly, the system results in higher prices to consumers.

Omitting a part and coming to the next page, I read this:

Where the concern making these contracts is already great and powerful, such as the United Shoe Machinery Co., the American Tobacco Co., and the General Film Co., the exclusive or "tying" contract made with local dealers becomes one of the greatest agencies and instrumentalities of monopoly ever devised by the brain of man. It completely shuts out competitors not only from trade in which they are already engaged but from the opportunities to build up trade in any community where these great and powerful combinations are operating under this system and practice. By this method and practice the Shoe Machinery Co. has built up a monopoly that owns and controls the entire machinery now being used by all great shoe-manufacturing houses of the United States. No independent manufacturer of shoe machines has the slightest opportunity to build up any considerable trade in this country while this condition obtains. If a manufacturer who is using machines of the Shoe Machinery Co. were to purchase and place a machine manufactured by any independent company in his establishment, the Shoe Machinery Co. could, under its contracts, withdraw all their machinery from the establishment of the shoe manufacturer and thereby wreck the business of the manufacturer. The General Film Co., by the same method practiced by the Shoe Machinery Co. under the lease system, has practically destroyed all competition and acquired a virtual monopoly of all films manufactured and sold in the United States. When we consider contracts of sales made under this system, the result to the consumer, the general public, and the local dealer and his business is even worse than under the lease system.

Mr. VARDAMAN. From what report has the Senator read?

Mr. REED. From the report of the committee of the House of Representatives on this bill. The House committee has given only two or three illustrations. It is a well-known fact now that nearly every large concern is following this practice, that it has become the right arm of monopoly, that it is a device which is contrary to the general policy of the law and would be illegal in itself except for the fact that they have tied this privilege to a patent privilege, and after many years of litigation they finally established the doctrine that a man having a patented article could sell it with any condition attached to it he saw fit. But the doctrine was so monstrous that the Supreme Court of the United States loudly called upon us to remedy the evil.

I said the other day, and I repeat to the few Senators who are giving attention to this bill, that as to any practice or any act that is so near the line of right that it is hard to distinguish whether it is right or wrong I can see much reason in the argument that as to such an act of a doubtful nature we might legislate without affixing a criminal penalty. But when an act of this kind is indulged in, that I have now discussed, the plainest and most deliberate attempt to extend monopolistic power, and when it has been practiced for years and has risen to a point which has evoked the protest of the Supreme Court to Congress, when it is an act that can never be done by inadvertence or mistake and which invariably contains every element essential to making out a case of murder in the first degree, namely, willfulness, deliberation, premeditation, and malice aforethought, I want to know why a criminal penalty should not be attached to it?

I want to know, if it is right to keep upon the statute books the Sherman law, which declared criminal every attempt to monopolize trade, every attempt to circumscribe commerce, why this plain practice of monopoly should not likewise be punished as a crime?

Mr. President, this decision came out that I called attention to the other day, and which has not in any manner been overruled or whittled away. I shall not take the time of the Senate to analyze the cases which were read. This case stands here unimpeached and unimpaired.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Senator seen the amendment of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I have.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not that cover this case?

Mr. REED. It covers the case in part, but it strikes out any criminal penalty, and it is not now offered as I expected it would be, as a substitute for this section, whereupon I would have moved to amend it. It carries no criminal penalty, and it does not cover everything covered by section 4. It is, in my judgment, inferior to section 4. President Taft challenged the attention of Congress to the necessity of legislation to meet this practice.

I say again, it seems to me that Congress is obsessed with the idea which has been urged that we should deal very gently with great business combinations. If I do not mistake the temper of this body to-day, it would not, as a matter of first instance, pass the Sherman Antitrust Act. I think there would be homeopathic physicians here who would propose to dilute the doses until a trust would not know whether it had taken the legal medicine or not.

I challenge nobody's good faith, but I do not belong to that school of modern philosophy that proposes to regulate a crime, that proposes to perpetuate trusts, that proposes to keep them, and then, if we would chastise them at all, do it as a fond father or as a tender-hearted mother may chastise an erring child, so that it may grow stronger and bigger and more potential.

Mr. President, this Congress is not willing to go as far as George W. Perkins. We trust busters, we men who stood before our people and assured them that if the Democratic Party came into power it would put teeth in the trust act, are not willing to go as far as the honorable George W. Perkins, of the Harvester Trust. Here is an article printed in the World's Work—printed, I should say, in Moody's Magazine. I did not think it could be in the World's Work, because it is an understood thing that a trust magnate never works. Let me read you a little:

> My own belief is that we have got to come to national incorporation of large interstate business enterprises. If instead of passing the Sherman law as it now stands we, as a people, had passed a law permitting companies the moment they began to do business outside their own State to obtain a national license or charter, placing themselves under regulations and control as to methods and capitalization, I believe we would have saved ourselves an endless amount of trouble and the country would have been much farther along in its commercial development than it is.

Then he suggests his remedy:

> Such relief can be obtained, I believe, along these lines:
> First. Create at once in the Department of Commerce and Labor a business court or controlling commission composed largely of experienced business men.

Now, do some of you begin to see where you got your trade commission from? It was born in the same brain and at about the same hour as the Harvester Trust was born. This article I am reading was written in 1912, but this doctrine was announced by this eminent gentleman long before that. I can imagine a meeting of the directorate of the Harvester Trust now passing a congratulatory resolution upon the fact that the first article in the creed of Mr. Perkins has already been accepted by a Democratic Congress of the United States. A commission of business men!

> Second. Give this body power to license corporations doing an interstate or international business.
> Third. Make such license depend on the ability of a corporation to comply with conditions laid down by Congress when creating such commission and with such regulations as may be prescribed by the commission itself.

If that last sentence is not completely covered by the expression "It shall have power to prevent unfair competition," then I do not know how you could comply with the suggestion.

> Fourth. Make publicity, both before and after license is issued, the essential feature of these rules and regulations.

Now, you will observe that we have carefully provided here that the commission shall make public its reports—I am omitting a part of this—

> Fifth. Make the violation of such rules—

That is, the rules of the commission—

> Make the violation of such rules and regulations punishable—

By contempt proceedings? Oh, no. Brother Perkins did not have the temerity to suggest so mild a remedy. This is what he said:

> Make the violation of such rules and regulations punishable by the imprisonment of individuals rather than by the revocation of the license of the company, adopting in this respect the method of procedure against national banks in case of wrongdoing.

Why, Perkins's suggestion of a commission carried with it the proposition of criminal responsibility for a violation of the rules of the commission, but we have provided nothing more than an injunction that does not have to be obeyed until a court, after full hearing, shall in turn have issued its injunction. Then the only possible penalty attached is to be punished for contempt if you do not obey. We are very progressive. In the matter of regulating trusts and letting them off easily, we can outrun George W. Perkins.

But, Mr. President, what is the use——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether Mr. Perkins's plan was intended as a substitute for the antitrust bill or whether it was to be supplemental to it?

Mr. REED. Oh, I think he wanted a general substitute.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, I shall not be diverted for one moment from this thought, and I repeat it, that as to acts which lie within the shadowland, where it is difficult to determine whether they tend toward monopoly or whether they are honest practices of business, I have no quarrel with those who seek to set up a tribunal to ascertain the fact and who would impose no serious penalty until the fact is ascertained; but as to those practices of monopoly the direct and inevitable effect of which is to oppress other business men, as to those acts which have been followed for years and have now become the favorite device of the monopolists, as to those acts which taken alone and pursued long enough have been known to absolutely create complete and absolute monopoly, as is shown by the Shoe Machinery Trust and by the other trusts I named a moment ago—as to those practices, I say it is inexcusable to do anything except to affix to them a criminal penalty.

One of the most aggravated of those practices is described in section 4 of this bill. It is aimed directly at the methods employed by the particular trusts I have been discussing, but it goes beyond that. Let us read it:

SEC. 4. That any person engaged in commerce who shall lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

It covers no case where any human being can be honestly mistaken. It simply covers the case of a man having a commodity for sale who refuses to sell it unless the purchaser shall contract that he will deal with nobody else with reference to certain other things, but will purchase from that man alone.

Now, let us consider the matter a moment and see what can be accomplished if that practice is permitted to go on. I use the illustration I used the other day. The Steel Trust has acquired many patents. I have no doubt it has some particular variety of steel that may be very essential in the great construction work going on in this country. If this practice is permitted to continue the Steel Trust can refuse to sell that particular variety of steel to any person engaged in constructing a great bridge or a great building unless he will also purchase from it every other article of steel he uses. It therefore, in the hands of an institution like the Steel Trust, becomes a great weapon of oppression, a great instrumentality of monopoly; it is, indeed, nearly all that is necessary in order to create a legal monopoly for it is a legal monopoly because the courts have held that as the law now stands that kind of practice can be indulged.

Why should we deal tenderly with the Steel Trust officer who makes that sort of contract? Does he make any mistake? Does he not go into it with his eyes open? Does he not understand exactly what he is doing? Does he not do it with the same evil purpose that is in the heart of any man who starts out to create a monopoly or to restrain trade? Is it not, in fact, a plain device created for the purpose of restraining trade? Who is there can dispute that proposition?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if that is so, I desire to ask the Senator whether it would not be punishable under the antitrust act?

Mr. REED. The Senator evidently did not hear——

Mr. WALSH. I was following the Senator carefully.

Mr. REED. The decision of the Supreme Court which I read a few days ago, which held that if A is the owner of a patented article he can attach to the sale of that article a notice requiring the purchaser to use the products which he makes and not to use the products of others.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator knows, likewise, that I have offered on behalf of the committee an amendment to take care of exactly that situation.

Mr. REED. I know that the Senator contemplates offering that amendment——

Mr. WALSH. The chairman of the committee has signified that he will accept it.

Mr. REED. But I am now answering the Senator's question. I am now discussing the patent phase of the question, and the fact that the Senator has offered—and nobody respects or can respect the Senator more than I do—the fact that the Senator has offered an amendment does not bar me from the right to insist that the language of the House bill is ample and sufficient, and it has not yet come to be lese majeste for a humble member of a committee to insist that the language of a House bill shall stand.

Mr. President, section 4 goes a little further than the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana. Section 4 goes to the extent suggested by the Senator from Iowa, of prohibiting a man from selling any article, patented or unpatented, upon the terms that the purchaser will not deal in the goods of another. That provision of section 4 especially commends itself to my humble judgment.

I believe that if we are to stop monopoly and restraint of trade it is our business to begin at the ground floor. We can not arrest a great legislative bill because in some particular or in some isolated instance it may interfere with some trifling matter. We must look to the general good and the general results; and I hold that it would be wholesome law to enact that every man engaged in interstate commerce should offer his goods upon the open market and that every individual should have the right to purchase under the same or similar circumstances at the same price; but I do not care to argue that.

The Senator from Iowa made the point that the particular matter I am now discussing would be in the interest of large concerns and would cripple the smaller competitor of the large concerns. He illustrated that by the case, among others, of Quaker Oats and rolled oats, using for the purpose of his illustration substantially this statement—that Quaker Oats have a very great reputation; that people buy them upon their reputation; and that a manufacturer of rolled oats therefore coming into the community could not vend his goods unless he was allowed to employ an exclusive agent, who would be interested in building up a trade in order that he might reap the profits which would inure after the trade had been built up.

There is nothing in this bill which prohibits any man from employing a special agent and an exclusive agent. As I read the bill, any individual engaged in manufacturing goods can employ an exclusive agent to sell his goods and sell nobody else's, but that is a matter of principal and agent. What the bill aims at is the case of a vendor of goods selling them to a dealer upon the express provision, not that the dealer will handle his goods, but that the dealer will not handle anybody else's goods, thus depriving the public of the opportunity to buy both classes of goods over the same counter and in actual competition, and also depriving the dealer of his opportunity to buy in the open market and from whomsoever he pleases.

I can not agree with the argument produced by the Senator from Iowa upon this point, for, said he, in substance, if the vender of the rolled oats is not permitted to stipulate that the purchaser of his goods shall not also be the purchaser and vender of Quaker Oats, he can never enter the market, because there will be no inducement to the purchases of the rolled oats to build up trade.

Why, Mr. President, that does not follow at all. It does not follow that because a man has the privilege of selling both Quaker Oats and rolled oats he can not make money by building up a trade in rolled oats, and having built up that trade in rolled oats, taking down the profits incident to that trade. The fact that if a customer comes to his counter and asks for Quaker Oats he can say to him, "I can supply you Quaker Oats, but here is a better article," does not at all keep him from booming the rolled-oats business or making money out of it. There is no reason why a man would desire to be the agent for the rolled oats and be barred from selling Quaker Oats. On the contrary, that man would rather have the exclusive agency for the rolled oats and also have the privilege of selling the Quaker Oats. I think the argument that is advanced here utterly fails. I have such very great respect for the opinion of my friend from Iowa that I hesitate to argue a question upon which he has made up his mind. I am glad he and I agree on so many features of this bill, but in this one respect I think he is mistaken.

It has been urged here that section 4 will stop the weak concerns from being able to compete with the great concerns. Mr. President, there is not a single practice that is prohibited by section 4 that can not be used by the great concern against the small concern with a thousand times more effect than it can ever be used by the small concern against the great concern.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it the opinion of the Senator that the retention of sections 2 and 4 would impair the usefulness of the trade commission?

Mr. REED. Not in the least; and I am perfectly willing that anyone shall offer an amendment specifically providing "that the practices hereby inhibited are hereby declared to be unfair competition," and that jurisdiction to enforce them may be exercised concurrently by the trade commission and by the courts, if anyone wants that kind of amendment. I do not care how many ways we have to enforce the law.

Mr. President, I have only a word further to say. The argument has been made in this country, and very skillfully made, through pamphlets and magazines and papers, that we have arrived at a time when we ought not to disturb business. I am afraid that argument has taken root in the minds of entirely too many people. The purpose of every honest antitrust statute that ever has been put upon the books has been not to disturb business, but to preserve business. The best friend of commerce is the man who is willing to drive from the commercial seas every pirate craft, so that all vessels, big and little, freighted with honest cargoes and bent upon honest missions, may in safety reach their ports.

We wage no war upon business. We wage war upon conspiracies against business. We wage no battle upon trade. We seek to make trade possible and safe in this country. If a man owned a fishpond stocked with bass, and he discovered that a number of sharks had somehow or other gotten into that fishpond and were destroying the bass, he would not be an enemy of the fish tribe who insisted upon killing off the sharks to the end that the other fish might live.

All we have ever endeavored to do is to create or restore a condition where business concerns with ordinary capital shall not be destroyed and driven from the fields of commerce by vast conspiracies created for the purpose of driving these institutions from the fields of commerce. Having had a law of that kind upon the statute books for over 20 years, we are now told by the President in his message, we are told by the Supreme Court in its decisions, and we know from our own observation that certain new devices have been developed for the purpose of defeating the ends of the law, and that these practices may become very oppressive and yet not have reached the point where it is possible to demonstrate an actual monopoly or an actual restraint of trade. Accordingly we have entered upon the business of endeavoring now to reach the practices which create monopoly or which are the instrumentalities of monopoly, to the end that when a case is brought into court it shall not be necessary in all cases to prove an actual monopoly or actual restraint of trade, but the court may reach the institution provided you show that certain practices have been indulged in by that institution. The question now to be determined is whether or not we shall strike out of this bill the criminal provisions and whether we shall go without them at all. That is the question we must answer here to-day, if we vote to-day.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Martin, Va.	Shields
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hughes	Myers	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Jones	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Overman	Sterling
Chilton	Kern	Owen	Thomas
Culberson	Lane	Perkins	Thornton
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman	Vardaman
Fall	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Walsh
Fletcher	Lewis	Reed	White
Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Forty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. CLAPP, Mr. BRADY, Mr. BRISTOW, and Mr. SHIVELY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish simply to say a final word to the Senate, and it will take me just two minutes to say it.

The question now is whether we will perfect section 4 by restoring it to the condition it was in when it came from the House. In that condition it prescribes a criminal penalty. If the motion is carried I understand there will be a motion made by the chairman of the committee then to strike out the section as perfected.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is, the amendment of the committee pending.

Mr. REED. Very well. The Senator from Texas informs me that the motion now is to strike out section 4 as it now is and as it came from the House. It contains a criminal penalty. It is now proposed to strike out that entire section.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has not the Senator from Missouri offered a substitute for the section as it now appears in the bill?

Mr. REED. I was about to say, if the section is stricken out, which is the motion now before the Senate——

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. When I finish the sentence I will. Then it is proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to offer an amendment which has been printed and which prohibits the making of tying contracts by those who have patents. That section as proposed to be introduced contains no penal clause. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Missouri, as I understand it, is entirely mistaken. I certainly was here when he offered a substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. And read it.

Mr. BRISTOW. And read it to the Senate—the section as it came from the House, including a part of the Senate committee amendment. As the Senator read the section it is as I want it, and we are now to vote upon his amendment to section 4, perfecting it, before the motion of the committee to strike it out is put.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from Texas to say that we had already passed that point.

Mr. CULBERSON. No, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Then, so that the Senate may understand it, the question that is to be voted upon by the Senate is to perfect section 4 so that it will read as I read it to the Senate, and which I ask shall now be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 4 it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 4. That any person engaged in commerce who shall lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. REED. The motion now is to perfect the section so that it will read as read from the desk. I understand that if the motion is carried the chairman of the commission intends to move to strike out the section, and the Senator from Montana intends to move a substitute which will limit its operation only to patented articles and which will not have any criminal penalty attached to it. I have stated the matter, and I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to insert a substitute for section 4.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood that heretofore section 4 had been eliminated from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that a motion was made to reconsider and that it was carried yesterday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And it is now a part of the bill as reported by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It stands as the committee reported it, with the motion of the committee to strike it out.

Mr. CULBERSON. The motion was made heretofore, and section 4 was stricken out. Afterwards a motion was made to reconsider the action of the Senate in striking out section 4. That motion to reconsider was adopted yesterday, and consequently the section is here, and the Committee on the Judiciary propose an amendment to strike it out altogether from the bill. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment to perfect the section. The vote will be taken on that amendment, and then the question will be put on the amendment of the Senate committee to strike out the section as perfected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. The Chair understands that the question now before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri who offers a substitute for section 4. [Putting the question.] The Chair is impressed that the ayes have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. Not knowing how he would vote I withhold my vote unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I have a pair, and unless it is necessary to vote to make a quorum I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who, I understand, is not present. I am informed that I can transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. Therefore I do that and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Being unable to procure a transfer, I shall be compelled to withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I desire to be counted as present to make a quorum. I can not vote on account of the absence of my pair.

Mr. GORE. I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] on account of sickness in his family.

I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; and

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to inquire before the result is announced whether a quorum is present, because if there is no quorum present I shall be at liberty to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then in order to conserve the rights of my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] I shall vote as I think probably he would vote, although it would not be my vote. I vote "yea" and save his right and at the same time I can be counted.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to be recorded as present to make a quorum.

Mr. HOLLIS. Under the terms of my pair I am at liberty to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been informed that under recent rulings I may be counted present upon my request without voting. Is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that has been customary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then. I understand that I can be counted as present to constitute a quorum without voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued, without objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to be recorded as present.

Mr. OWEN. Under my arrangement I have a right to vote to make a quorum, and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Borah	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Shields
Brady	Jones	Nelson	Smoot
Bristow	Kenyon	Perkins	Sterling
Clapp	Lane	Pittman	Thompson
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Townsend
Dillingham	Lewis	Reed	Vardaman
Fall	McCumber	Sheppard

NAYS—23.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hollis	Owen	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Hughes	Pomerene	Thornton
Camden	Kern	Ransdell	Walsh
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	White
Culberson	Newlands	Simmons

NOT VOTING—46.

Brandegee	Gore	Oliver	Stone
Burleigh	Gronna	Page	Sutherland
Burton	James	Penrose	Swanson
Catron	Johnson	Robinson	Thomas
Chamberlain	La Follette	Root	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Sherman	Weeks
Colt	Lodge	Shively	West
Crawford	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
du Pont	Myers	Smith, Mich.	Works
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Goff	O'Gorman	Stephenson

So Mr. REED'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee to strike out the section as amended and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and not knowing how he would vote, if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and its transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and transferring the pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote; but I desire to be counted as "present."

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. GRONNA'S name was called). The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], but on the statement which has been made, that if present he would vote "nay," I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair as previously, and am not at liberty to vote, on account of his absence.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and, in his absence, withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I am at liberty to vote if necessary to make a quorum, but will refrain from voting unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and withhold my vote, but ask to be recorded as "present."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and transferring it as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and transferring it to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and, being unable to secure a transfer, I must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I request to be recorded as present to constitute a quorum.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OWEN. I inquire of the Presiding Officer if a quorum has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that a quorum has not as yet voted.

Mr. OWEN. Then I have the right to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand that a quorum has not voted, and I, therefore, will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	Gallinger	Overman	Smoot
Bankhead	Hollis	Owen	Thornton
Bryan	Hughes	Ransdell	Townsend

So the motion to strike out section 4 was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I now offer, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section, to be known as section 4, the following:

SEC. 4. That it shall not be lawful to insert a condition in any contract relating to the sale or lease of or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, or the effect of which will be to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire from the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, any article or class of articles not protected by the patent; and any such conditions shall be null and void, as being in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I simply wish to say, for the benefit of Senators who were not here when this matter was up before, that on Friday last the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] called the attention of the Senate and of the Committee on the Judiciary, so far as that is concerned, for the first time to the significance of the decision made by the Supreme Court in what is known as the Dick case, or the mimeograph case, in its application to unfair trade. The practice is to sell or to lease patented articles coupled with the condition that the purchaser or lessee must buy a lot of other unpatented articles, or articles which were at one time patented but the patents on which have expired, from the patentee as a condition of getting the patented article at all. It is used as a means of fostering monopoly.

When the article is not patented it is believed that practices of that character can easily be taken care of by the trade commission as unfair competition; but it is open to very serious question whether the trade commission will be able to put under the ban practices of that kind, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case referred to. This amendment is intended to prevent the making of contracts of that character, the idea being that the patentee is entitled to the exclusive use of his patent; but it ought not to be used to give him a monopoly of the sale of articles not patented.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very glad, indeed, if out of all the labor and travail that I have undergone with reference to this section there shall at least be saved a little; and the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana does in part meet the question. It is very much better than nothing. Nevertheless, I regret that it does not cover certain other practices which I think ought to be covered; but as those practices were covered by section 4, which was defeated a few moments ago after full debate, I have nothing further to say about them.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this section contains no penalty whatever; I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this section is aimed at a practice that is of years' standing; that it is the favorite device of the monopolist; that there is as much reason to affix a penalty clause to it as there is to any practice denounced by the Sherman Act itself; and I for once propose to try to get a vote of the Senate squarely as to whether they are going to abandon the method of stopping monopolistic practices by invoking the criminal law. That is all that I intend to say upon this section, except to offer an amendment to add at the end of the section the following words:

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should regard it as exceedingly unfortunate if this amendment should be added to the amendment proposed by me a few moments ago. Senators will perfectly well understand the significance of it. Now, bear in mind that if a man who has not a patent sells or leases that article upon condition that the purchaser or lessee shall also provide himself with other articles from the seller or lessor all you do now is to hale him before the trade commission and he is enjoined from making that kind of a contract; there is no penalty at all as to him; but if a man has a patent, and he does the same thing, he is guilty of a crime. We can not stand for that kind of legislation. The Senator from Missouri will not ask us to stand for that kind of legislation; that is to say, I feel that in his heart if he can not affix a penalty to the making of contracts of that character, whether made by a man with a patented article or a man without a patented article, he will not ask you to affix that burden upon the man with the patented article.

Bear in mind that what is here denounced is lawful now; the contract is perfectly legal, and it is so held by the Supreme Court of the United States—that is, at least, within certain limitations, as I contend. It seems to me that when you put the man with the patented article on exactly the same footing as the man with the unpatented article you have done all that the necessities of the case require.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had stated that I was through talking; but, of course, this raises a new question, and I will ask the Senate to bear with me a moment further.

We are asked now to refuse to attach a penal provision to this particular practice because we have failed to attach a penal provision to another villainous practice. I am not responsible for the lack of a penal provision as to the other practice, but I am unwilling that this section shall be passed without a criminal provision. Then, after having passed this section with a criminal provision, we can, if we want to be fair and equitable between the violators of good law and good morals, proceed to affix a criminal penalty to all of them; but do not let us defeat this proposal because we have made a mistake by letting the other variety of offenders go with nothing but a mild reprimand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. I have just a word to say with regard to the distinction suggested by the Senator from Montana. I believe that whenever we declare a thing unlawful, and the declaration is so clear that the citizen can understand it and can apply it without danger of mistake, he ought, if he violates it, to be punished criminally. I regard the prohibition which is contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana as entirely clear; no one can misunderstand it; it does not embrace what we ordinarily know as a "twilight zone."

I have been opposed and am now opposed to attaching a criminal penalty to the offense or the act known as unfair competition, because it embraces a great field, just as the prohibition against restraint of trade embraces a great and unknown field; but this, as I have said before, is not a prohibition against unfair competition, in my judgment. It is a prohibition of a practice that has become well known, and that is condemned by the efforts of the best business men of the United States and by all men who believe in honesty and in good morals. Therefore it seems to me that this offense ought to be punishable by a criminal penalty, precisely as I hope the offense of one corporation holding the stock of another shall be so punished, and precisely as the question of interlocking directors shall be so punished when the commission has determined that the corporations are competitive in their character.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, this paragraph relates to tying contracts. In my judgment, without any such amendment as is suggested by the Senator from Montana or such a provision as was urged by the Senator from Missouri, it would be within the jurisdiction of the Federal trade commission to issue an order upon proof compelling a defendant to cease and desist from such a practice, under the unfair-competition clause of the trade-commission bill.

The trade commission is called upon to enforce the provisions with reference to unfair competition. The trade commission can be invoked to enforce the provision which the Senator from Montana seeks to have incorporated in this bill. If the trade commission makes an order to cease and desist, and the practice is not discontinued by the defendant, the trade commission can enforce its order through an application to the court, which will issue an injunction, which, if violated, would result in the punishment of the recalcitrant defendant, either by imprisonment or fine, and certainly by imprisonment if the practice was not discontinued.

I regard that as a much better method of accomplishing the discontinuance of these obnoxious practices than a resort to grand juries and trial juries. I believe that all these complicated questions relating to trade should be enforced so far as practicable through the trade commission, with the aid of the courts, and not by criminal process. For 20 years we have endeavored to enforce the Sherman antitrust law through resort to criminal prosecutions, and they have not been successful. They have certainly not been half so successful as the courts themselves through the process of injunction. So I am opposed to adding a penal clause to this provision.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think the trade commission can set aside a statute of the United States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it can.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think it can set aside a right secured by a statute of the United States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not think it can.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has justified these very practices upon the ground that they are lawful because a patent has been issued pursuant to a statute of the United States, and therefore that unless this provision is enacted the trade commission, proceeding to deal with the practice, would be confronted with the statute relating to patents, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and several decisions of the courts of appeal of the United States to the effect that these practices are legal under the rights secured by a patent. Therefore, if the commission can not set aside those rights and they can not be reached here, they can not be reached at all.

The Senator evidently was not here when this matter was discussed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the bill with reference to unfair competition has not yet been enacted. When it is enacted, the commission will have jurisdiction, in my judgment, to condemn this as an unfair practice. I am not opposed to the legislation suggested by the Senator from Montana. I am opposed to adding to it penal provisions, because I think we can get at these things much more efficiently through the trade commission and through the civil courts.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for a moment in order that I may ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Does the Senator from Nevada think that by adopting this penal provision the trade commission will lose its control?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WHITE. Then why not have both?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not see the necessity for it. I am opposed to this system of trying all your cases in the criminal courts. I believe it is a false system, and I believe the civil courts can deal much more efficiently with the entire subject of restraints of trade and unfair competition; and the power of the court to issue an injunction and to punish a defendant for disobedience of an injunction will be much more efficient than these criminal prosecutions, which thus far, in my judgment, have practically failed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. REED. The injunction right will exist here; the trade-commission right will exist here; and in addition there will be the criminal provision, which probably will make it unnecessary for either of them to act very vigorously, because the practice will stop.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. REED. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before I vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. GRONNA's name was called). Again announcing the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] I will state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and transferring it to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as heretofore to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. I inquire whether or not a quorum has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum has voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE. I desire to announce my pair, and ask the Chair to count me as present.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—20.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Perkins	Sterling

So Mr. REED's amendment to the amendment of Mr. WALSH was agreed to.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to suggest an additional amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Montana. In the twelfth line, after the word "conditions," I move to insert "whether heretofore or hereafter made," so that it will read: "And any such conditions, whether heretofore or hereafter made, shall be null and void."

I believe that is acceptable to the author of the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to understand the effect of this. Do I understand that the Senator from Maryland is undertaking to punish men for making contracts which were valid at the time they were made, but which we are now seeking to punish them for having made them?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The idea is simply to make the conditions of the contract void.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I just heard it read here, but it would seem to have some of the qualities of an ex post facto law.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It could not have any such effect upon the criminal aspect of the statute, but it would have the effect of rendering void these undesirable forms of contracts, particularly in connection with the patent system of the United States. It provides that those already made shall be void as well as that those hereafter made shall be void. That is the only significance of this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's amendment would simply have the effect of declaring them void; if so, that is all right.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. That is all—those heretofore made.

Mr. BORAH. That is all right.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of the question raised by the Senator from Idaho, I should like to have the section read as it would read if thus amended.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Maryland, after the word "conditions," in line 12, to insert a comma and the words "whether heretofore or hereafter made," in section 4, as offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHITE. I will inquire of the Senator from Maryland if we make the condition void in existing contracts, would it not give the other party to the contract power to void the whole contract? If that is the effect of it, and I am afraid it is, then I am opposed to its adoption. I do not think we ought to interfere with contracts already existing.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The words I have added to the amendment of the Senator from Montana simply refer to the objectionable conditions and to nothing else, namely, the conditions which are repelled by the whole amendment that apparently was about to receive the approval of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. But the Senator does not quite answer my question. Will it not have the effect to enable the other party to the contract to declare the whole contract void?

Mr. BORAH. I ask for a reading of the amendment as proposed to be amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall not be lawful to insert a condition in any contract relating to the sale or lease of or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, or the effect of which will be to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire from the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees any article or class of articles not protected by the patent; and any such conditions, whether heretofore or hereafter made, shall be null and void, as being in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. I think I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. WHITE. I had not yielded the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator if he desires to make a statement. I am satisfied I had the floor, but I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to say that the effect of this, of course, will be to impair the obligation of contracts now existing, and I think the Senate should go very slow in doing that, because we do not know just how many and how important those contracts may be. It is always dangerous, in my judgment, to declare void or inoperative contracts already in existence. The parties knew what they were doing when they made the contracts, and it may work a great hardship on them if the contracts made by them are destroyed by the legislative power of the country. I think it is dangerous, and I shall oppose the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not safe to venture an opinion upon a legal proposition offhand, but my opinion is that if the provision is enacted the law would be void.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, it is very seldom that I differ from my honored friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE]; but this being a police measure having a definite application for the prevention of what the Senate has voted to be a crime or an offense, it has an entirely different bearing from the ordinary merely contractual aspect. Under these circumstances, if the Senator himself were sitting as a judge in equity and any such contract was presented to him for review, in which some patented machine was rented to some manufacturer who was compelled also to buy a lot of other things that he did not want, it would be a very easy thing for the Senator sitting as such a court to differentiate between the consideration that was presented by the contract, to make void those burdens which were improperly placed upon the lessee, and to make good the considerations which the lessee should pay for the use of the valuable machinery of which he had the advantage. I see no difficulty in the situation whatsoever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. With his permission, I would like to ask the author of the amendment the necessity of certain words appearing in it. For instance, it says that it shall not be lawful to insert a condition in any contract relating to the sale or lease of or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not. What is the necessity of inserting the words "whether patented or not"? Do not the words "whether patented or not" embrace all kinds of articles? If so, why encumber the amendment with this verbiage? All articles are either patented or not. I would be pleased if the Senator will give me his reason for using these words.

Mr. WALSH. That was simply for greater clarity and definiteness. They are suggested by the decisions in the two cases. In the Mimeograph case the articles tied to the patented articles were unpatented. They consisted of ink and paper and other articles of that character to be used in connection with the mimeograph. It is contended, however, in the Shoe Machinery case that they are permitted under any circumstances to tie several patented articles together. It was feared that if the language "whether patented or not" was not in the amendment it would be contended that it was restricted in its application only to unpatented articles. It was for the purpose of making it clear that neither patented nor unpatented articles could be tied that the clause was inserted.

Mr. WHITE. I will ask the Senator the necessity for the use of the words, beginning on the seventh line, as follows: "supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor or his nominee."

Mr. WALSH. It is the very gist of the amendment that it shall be unlawful.

Mr. WHITE. Is not the effect of the use of these words to give the purchaser, lessee, or licensee the right to use any articles whatsoever, without regard as to who supplied or owned them?

Mr. WALSH. It refers to him only, or anybody he may nominate.

Mr. WHITE. If that is the true construction, are we not left in the dangerous situation of having him transfer his patent to some other person and let that other person do the harm that he at present can do?

Mr. WALSH. He may transfer his patent to some other person. Of course, the purchase or lease would have to be made from that other person and not from him.

Mr. WHITE. It says "supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees." It occurs to me that some other person who owns or controls a patented article with which the lessor has no connection might use it to accomplish the very same purpose that the seller of the patented article himself could attain, and therefore defeat the very object sought to be accomplished by the amendment.

I will make this further suggestion: On line 11, after the word "and," just before the conclusion of that line, add the words "all contracts containing," thereby vitiating the entire contract instead of vitiating only the prohibited condition in the contract. Would not that be very much more effective in preventing any such condition being embodied in the contract?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that it would not. That would really be very unfortunate, indeed. Here is a man who is obliged to buy under such a condition. They attach such a condition to his acquisition of the instrument or the machine, and he has a lease of the machine with such a condition in his lease. If you make the entire lease void, then he has not any right to the use of the machine at all, and the seller can come and take it right out of his factory.

Mr. WHITE. But would it not operate as a greater deterrent on the seller or lessor by making the whole contract void and thereby tend to prevent him from insisting on the insertion of any such condition? If the seller or lessor knew he would vitiate his whole contract by inserting the condition, he would not likely insert it.

Mr. WALSH. I should say not. I should say as it is the purchaser or lessee would get all the benefit and the seller or lessor would take all the risk that he might at any time insist upon the validity of the condition.

Mr. WHITE. Provided the lessee or purchaser knew all the time exactly what his rights were, but in the absence of any such knowledge he would go on and perform the contract, whereas if the whole contract was made void then the seller or lessor or licensor would be afraid to make any such contract.

I call the attention of the author of the amendment and the committee to these propositions and I think they are worthy of the consideration both of the committee and of the author of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama that I have carefully followed him and I am not able to adopt his view.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 6393) granting an increase of pension to William H. Miller; and

A bill (S. 6394) granting an increase of pension to George W. Brewer (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 6395) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913," and known as the Federal reserve act, approved August 4, 1914; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow forenoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 27, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 26, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, infinite source of all good, we come to Thee in prayer that we may renew our spiritual life and be prepared to meet whatever may come to us. The past is gone, the future a sealed book; help us to wisely improve the present and "go forward to meet the shadowy future with brave and manly hearts." For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following requests for leave of absence, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHACKLEFORD requests leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAYES requests leave of absence until next Monday on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia asks leave of absence for one week on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, yesterday the House granted leave of absence to one of our distinguished colleagues, Mr. DICKINSON, of Missouri, I think very properly, and our distinguished Speaker stated that Mr. DICKINSON was sick in bed, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HAMLIN, also stated that he was sick in bed. I simply wish to congratulate Mr. DICKINSON upon his early recovery. The St. Louis newspaper states that he is attending the Democratic convention at Jefferson City, Mo., and at the time the paper went to press was in consideration for chairman of that convention. I am glad to know of his speedy recovery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILSON of New York asks leave of absence on account of illness, with certificate of physician attached.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say this: Here is a request for leave of absence on account of sickness, having a physician's certificate attached, which clearly shows that the request should be granted. I want to say this to the House, that when I offered the resolution yesterday to require the Sergeant at Arms to enforce the law, I meant that resolution in earnest, so far as I am concerned, and I intend to see to it that the Sergeant at Arms enforces the law, if I have to call upon the Treasury Department to go after the Sergeant at Arms' bond, if he does not enforce the law. So far as these leaves of absence are concerned, I am not going to interfere with them. If gentlemen think that they can get around the law by asking the House to excuse them they are very badly mistaken. The law puts that authority in the hands of the Sergeant at Arms of this House. If a Member of this House satisfies the Sergeant at Arms that he is absent on account of sickness he ought to be excused, and he will be excused, but the fact that the House excuses a man on account of sickness does not affect the law at all, and if he is not really sick the Sergeant at Arms will make himself liable upon his bond if he grants the excuse. I have notified the Sergeant at Arms this morning that I propose to hold him responsible if he does not enforce this law. I am not going to get up here and raise any objection to these requests for leave of absence on account of sickness or any other ground, because when a Member asks for that leave of absence he puts the Sergeant at Arms of this House upon notice that he is away, and I take it that the Sergeant at Arms' business is to know whether that is a lawful excuse. Therefore I can see that no harm is done by gentlemen asking for leaves of absence.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOON. What does the gentleman understand to be the exact language of the law upon this subject?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will refer to the RECORD this morning, he will find the law printed in the RECORD. I put it in the RECORD yesterday.

Mr. MOON. Was that a law passed by the Congress or a resolution of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is an enactment of law. It is the fortieth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and I will read it to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. I wanted to know whether it was an enactment of Congress or merely a resolution of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is an enactment of Congress. Some gentlemen may not have been here yesterday. This is a law that has been upon the statute books a great many years, and it is found in section 40 of the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows, being found on page 15539 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday:

SEC. 40. The Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant at Arms of the House, respectively, shall deduct from the monthly payments of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he has been absent from the Senate or House, respectively, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

That is a question for the Sergeant at Arms of this House to determine.

Mr. MOON. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I am not desiring any leave of absence, but there are a great many gentlemen here who are under the impression that the resolution which was offered yesterday was not based upon permanent law. I presumed that it was, and for that reason I called attention to it.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HAY. The law reads:

Unless such Member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HAY. If the Member assigns that reason, what power has the Sergeant at Arms to say that he is not sick. Has he the power to have him visited by a physician?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. HAY. To begin an inquisition into his physical condition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I think not.

Mr. HAY. Very well, then; when a Member assigns to the Sergeant at Arms or states to him that he is sick, and, therefore, is unable to attend upon the proceedings of the House, what can the Sergeant at Arms do?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He can not do anything; but I take this to be the fact, that the Sergeant at Arms of this House will require a statement from the Members of the House as to how many days they have been in attendance, in order that he may enforce the law, and if a Member of this House states on his authority as a Member that he has been sick the Sergeant at Arms will take his word for it, just as the gentleman or myself would take his word for it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that he proposed to see that the Sergeant at Arms enforces the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. And that the Sergeant at Arms would be liable upon his bond if he failed to enforce the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course passing the resolution yesterday directing the Sergeant at Arms to enforce the law did not change the law——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Nor the duty of the Sergeant at Arms?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. So that when the gentleman says he will be liable if he has not enforced the law, the Sergeant at Arms of the present House must be liable for not having enforced the law from the beginning of the present term of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that may be true; I do not say that is not true.

Mr. MANN. Of course if, as the gentleman said, he would see that the law is enforced, I do not know what process he would adopt; but suppose some other Member of the House should endeavor to do the same thing against the Sergeant at Arms from the beginning of the term of Congress, it would be pretty hard on the Sergeant at Arms?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course that is a matter that I am not concerned about.

Mr. MANN. But the Sergeant at Arms is concerned about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that he is; and the Sergeant at Arms and every Member of this House was aware of this law months ago.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Assuming that the Sergeant at Arms may not be to blame for not having enforced the law until the House passed the resolution directing him so to do, as I understand it he can not enforce the law until the end of the month, the time when it comes to make payments of salary. If he enforces the law at the end of this month, on the 4th of next month, when payments become due, of course he will have to make a deduction from the beginning of the month.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not passing on this question as a lawyer, because——

Mr. MANN. There can not be any question about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, as I understand the proposition, the Sergeant at Arms can withhold, if he sees proper to do so, the money of any Member of this House who has been absent without excuse of sickness of himself or family at any time up to the end of this Congress. He could take out, for instance, the last two months' salary entirely if he wanted to do it; that is the law; and I do not think there is a dispute on that question.

Mr. MANN. I think it is the duty of the Sergeant at Arms at the end of the month to require each Member of the House to make a certificate covering the entire month.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand what was done in the Fifty-third Congress was that the Speaker directed the Sergeant at Arms to enforce this law, and the Sergeant at Arms sent a certificate to each Member of the House for signature containing a copy of the law and a certificate covering the absences for which deductions should be made in accordance with the terms of the law. I am frank to say that yesterday I advised one of the officials of the office of the Sergeant at Arms who asked me that I thought he could properly under the conditions use the same kind of a certificate now that was used by the Democratic Sergeant at Arms in the Fifty-third Congress, following the precedent then set.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think that is true. The only reason I rose was in view of the number of requests for leave of absence on account of sickness some one might want to know why I did not object as I was trying to enforce this rule, and I merely want to say to the House and call their attention to the fact that the action of the House is not to govern. It is a question between the Member and the Sergeant at Arms——

Mr. MANN. Absolutely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Therefore it makes no material difference whether we grant the leaves of absence or not.

Mr. MANN. It is a question of honor on the part of the Member who makes the certificate. He can evade the law and get his money; but will he?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think he will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In view of the fact that the salary of each Member of Congress is fixed by law and can be changed only by law and can not be changed by the Sergeant at Arms, if the certificate which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just mentioned should be presented to a Member of Congress who has been here every day and he should fail to sign that certificate or to make a report to the Sergeant at Arms, is there any way by which the Sergeant at Arms or anybody else could deprive that Member of his salary in full?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so. I think the law does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the Member of Congress is here every day and fails to make the certificate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am bound to disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The law says the Sergeant at Arms shall withhold the pay, and that contemplates that the Sergeant at Arms——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Sergeant at Arms can withhold the pay only because of the absence and not for failure to make report. There is no law requiring a Member to make any report to the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Sergeant at Arms would be entitled to a reasonable opportunity to ascertain the facts.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. HOWARD. What effect, if any, would the granting of leaves of absence by the House have upon a Member's status as to this peculiar situation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. None whatever, in my judgment.

Mr. HOWARD. Then it is simply unnecessary for a Member to obtain leave from the House under any condition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He might obtain leave for other reasons. Even if it is costing him $25 a day, the House might send the Sergeant at Arms after him and bring him back, anyhow.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose a Member of Congress should obtain leave of absence for other reasons than sickness of himself or members of his family, what would be the status then?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would notify the Sergeant at Arms absolutely that he was forfeiting $25 a day.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he did not think in the face of the custom that has grown up, that has been followed by everybody, the Sergeant at Arms had performed his full duty if he exacted from a Member a certificate reaching back to the date of the adoption of the gentleman's resolution? It will not affect me, I will state, but it will work a little easier.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As this is the law, I can not pass on that proposition. Of course the House relieved the Sergeant at Arms of some responsibility by directing the Sergeant at Arms to enforce the law. He has to do it now by the order of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. True. We do and say things here under the pressure of the moment that might lead an administrative officer of the House to do something he should not do. While it does not affect me one way or another personally, as I have not been outside of the Capital this year, I do not think this House ought to exact of the Sergeant at Arms that he go back of the resolution and work a hardship on a lot of Members who have a right to rely on what has been the custom.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is for the Sergeant at Arms. The Sergeant at Arms started in yesterday in accordance with the resolution.

Mr. SIMS. The statute says "absent from his seat" instead of being absent from Washington. If a Member comes in here and answers one roll call and is absent from his seat the balance of the day, is he relieved by that one appearance?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Why does he have to answer to a roll call? It is known that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], for instance, is here to-day. Everybody knows it as a matter of record. How can he be charged for absence to-day if he fails to answer to a roll call, or if the Sergeant at Arms should undertake to "dock" him for to-day because he should fail to make such statement as the Sergeant at Arms might require of him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The law does not say where he shall be absent from.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman withhold that for just a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. I will withhold it for a moment at the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILSON]?

Mr. MANN. Has Mr. WILSON been sick all winter?

The SPEAKER. He has been sick most of the session.

Mr. MANN. And absent?

The SPEAKER. He has been sick and absent most of the session.

Mr. MANN. Are all the rest of the New York Members sick, too? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no information about any of them except this Member.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILSON]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that Mr. FOWLER, of Illinois, be excused for the day on account of sickness. He is confined to his bed, and his little daughter told me that he is under the care of a physician this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

AUGUST 26, 1914.

Mr. BLACKMON asks leave of absence for the day on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes a point of order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. He will withhold it for a moment. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this salary question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois to reserve that for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-five Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Ansberry	Austin	Barkley

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 270 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of absence for one week for my colleague, Mr. GALLIVAN, on account of the illness of his son.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BOWDLE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise? To object?

Mr. BOWDLE. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Marine News, of New York, entitled "American subsidies to foreign ships." It is a brief editorial. Together with that I would like to have printed an equally brief response of my own.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article from the Marine News, and also an answer to that article, on the subject of "American subsidies to foreign ships." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the resolution as to absent Members introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the Underwood resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Judge WATKINS, obtained a leave of absence on the 6th of August, having been called to his home by the serious illness of his daughter. On his arrival there he found it necessary to accompany her to New Mexico. It is impossible for him to return at this time, and I ask for an indefinite leave of absence for him under the circumstances. There has been no more faithful Member of the House in attendance than Judge WATKINS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] asks for leave of absence for Mr. WATKINS, on account of the serious illness of his daughter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—CODIFICATION OF THE PRINTING LAWS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 15902. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15902) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, with Mr. PAGE of North Carolina in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15902, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15902) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the agreement I ask for recognition for one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield of my time three-quarters of an hour to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Nebraska commences I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin if it is his understanding that he is to use an hour now? If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] comes in with an hour and another hour is taken, what situation will that leave us in?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will allow, the Chair will state that according to the statements of Members on the floor last Wednesday an agreement for 3 hours was reached for general debate. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked for 30 minutes, and that was included in the agreement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated in the RECORD—and the RECORD will bear me out—that I wanted an hour, of which I said I would yield three-quarters of an hour. Then the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] stated that he would reserve 15 minutes for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] and 1 hour for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. BARNHART. I stated that I would want 15 minutes reserved for the committee. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin fully understood it, that he might want to use three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire further time?

Mr. BARNHART. That would depend, Mr. Chairman. If there should be any proposition put forth, I thought I might use 15 minutes or I might not use any. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS], wants 15 minutes. Further than that I do not know that the committee wants any time.

Mr. MANN. Why would it not be practical now, the order of debate having been agreed to in the committee and not in the House, to extend the time now, so that the gentleman will have the time?

Mr. BARNHART. I understand from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that he will not want any extension if the gentleman from New York is not here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for 45 minutes.

CORN IMPORTATIONS—CORN TARIFF.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, in the summer of 1912 labor was well employed, prices were good, and all our industries were being conducted with activity and fair profit. These conditions satisfied a large number of American people. A political party, striving for preferment, demanding opportunity to assume control of public affairs, declared there should be a radical change wrought in the course of our industries. It promised, if opportunity were given, to better the industrial and commercial interests of the country.

The moving reason given by that party was that the "cost of living" was too high. "Cost of living" relates to all articles which enter directly or indirectly into the sustenance, comfort, and prudent enjoyment which make up proper American life. It includes food and drink, raiment and shelter, education and enjoyment. It is necessarily based upon production, transportation, change of form, and exchange.

That the "cost of living" was to be reduced was written large in the Baltimore platform, reiterated in the partisan press, and thundered from the platform throughout the campaign. The "cost of living" was to be reduced by radical tariff changes. Other issues were tendered, but were subordinate to the tariff. The party thus seeking power by reason of a divided opposition and its flattering promise succeeded at the polls. Both Houses of Congress and the Executive were Democratic, and the course of legislation for the large purpose was opened.

In preparing a bill which was to state definitely, first, the vice complained of, and second, the remedy therefor, they drafted and introduced at a special session called by the President for April 7, 1913, what was known as the Underwood and later as the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill, a tariff bill which I charge to be the foreigners' fraudulent bill of rights, which a future Congress will repeal, and a farmers' bill of wrongs, which the people will redress. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Ways and Means Committee considered what were the principal offenders among matters of industry and commerce and graded them according to the gravity of their alleged offending. In doing so, the majority members of that committee presented in their report, supporting the Underwood bill, on page 3, the following:

Certain distinct economic developments between the years of 1897 and 1913 must be studied in close connection with the working of the tariff law.

INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING.

"Probably the most striking economic change since 1897 has been the tremendous increase in the cost of living—a situation which has attracted the anxious attention of economists the world over. The following figures represent the relative advance in living costs that has taken place during the critical part of the period in question in the United States."

Relative to wholesale prices and per cent of increase over 1897.

Commodity.	Price, 1897.	Price, 1900.	Increase over 1897.	Price, 1910.	Increase over 1897.
Farm products	85.2	109.5	28.5	164.6	93.2
Food	87.7	104.2	18.8	128.7	46.7
Clothing	91.1	108.8	17.2	123.7	35.8
Metals and implements	86.6	120.5	39.1	128.5	48.2
Drugs and chemicals	94.4	115.7	22.5	117.0	23.9
House furnishing goods	80.8	106.1	18.1	111.6	24.2
Miscellaneous	92.1	109.8	19.2	133.1	44.5
All commodities	89.7	110.5	23.1	131.6	46.7

The committee, with the foregoing as a basis for assault, then proceeded to penalize the various classes of articles by reducing or removing the duties according to the following considerations:

First. Apparent increase of price during the existence of the Dingley and Payne laws.

Second. According to the degree of energy and zeal or the lack of them with which the majority committee members defended or did not defend articles considered.

Apparently, following this rule, the committee placed a large number of articles upon the free list. Nearly 80 per cent in value of these were farm products.

Second. Radical reductions were made in numerous articles, a large portion of which were farm products.

Third. There were reductions in other schedules, but none so radical as those included in the term "farm products."

This procedure was fundamentally inequitable, because, while farm products had apparently advanced in price a greater percentage since 1897 than any of the other divisions, yet it will be recalled that the fall in prices of farm products from 1892 to 1897 had been much greater than any other division or classification of articles considered. They were entitled to a greater percentage of advance than those which had not been so far reduced in that period. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The greatest of all farm products in this country is corn, and 100 per cent, or all of the tariff, was removed from it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. I will yield for this question, but my time is shorter than my matter, and after that I prefer not to yield.

Mr. GORDON. Is it your contention that the reduction of the tariff on farm products has reduced the price of them?

Mr. SLOAN. My contention will appear quite clearly, I think, and the evidence that I will present here from two distinguished witnesses from the gentleman's own State shows that the importation of corn in this country reduced the price of marketable corn in the United States at least 10 cents a bushel.

During the discussion of the bill I presented two amendments relative to corn, one to remove it from its free-list place in the bill, and, second, to retain a duty of 10 cents a bushel. The former duty was 15 cents. This would not have been in violation of any national platform pledge. The removal was a violation of all of them. Each of these amendments was voted down in Committee of the Whole by practically a party vote, the Democrats voting against and Republicans and Progressives voting in favor.

It was shown that imports of corn, while not large under the old law, were increasing from year to year while paying a duty of 15 cents a bushel.

No one claimed any virtue in throwing away the revenue which might be collected. The majority pressed the necessity of cheapening it to the buyer. A Member of Congress who should have risen in his place and said, "I am in favor of throwing away the revenue, and the corn prices will not be affected," would have been smiled at by every Member of the majority side.

Why Members like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] now stand on the floor of the House and try to tell the farmers that they did not intend and had not injured them is hard to understand. The manly course would be to say, "We placed corn on the free list to reduce the price to the noncorn-producing communities. We expect those people to save us in the day of the farmers' wrath."

It was a canny Scot who had long followed sinful ways until he was on terms of intimacy with "Auld Nick." Sandy finally made profession and joined the "kirk." A short time after he met "Auld Nick," who soundly upbraided him for deserting the cause. Said Sandy, "Not quite so fast, auld friend. 'Tis true I joined the kirk. To it I'll make profession; but I'll do the work for ye." The gentleman from Illinois professes much to the farmer, but when he made the corn tariff he did the work for the other fellow. [Laughter.]

The committee having laid out the basis for its work, forecasted the result of their legislation in the following significant statement found on page 18 of the tariff report:

> In our judgment the future growth of our great industries lies beyond the seas.

That tariff report was signed by 14 majority members of the Ways and Means Committee. These two statements of alleged cause and forecasted effect are interesting in the light of subsequent corn events. Between the enactment of the Underwood law and July 1, 1914, practically nine months elapsed. There was imported into the United States 11,843,166 bushels of corn, which was an increase of 4,210 per cent over the corresponding nine months' period of the preceding fiscal year. The greatest importation for any full year prior thereto was 903,062 bushels. It is predicted by Congressman HAMMOND and others that 21,000,000 bushels will be imported the first year of the new tariff law. Under conditions the estimate is not unreasonable.

Ninety-three per cent of the importations came from Argentina. That country lies in a latitude south corresponding to our own north, except that with a long eastern coast it has a greater stretch of latitude than has the United States. Argentina is a wonderful country, both in its activities and products, and has a prospect greater than almost any other country in the world. Especially is this true so far as meat and cereal productions are concerned. Its boundless grassy plains feed vast herds of sheep, cattle, and horses. Its fertile soil responds to the intelligent efforts of the husbandman, producing rich returns in corn, wheat, oats, and alfalfa, rivaling our prairie farms of the Northwest. There products greatly exceed the domestic demands, and its large surpluses seek the markets of the world. Especially is this true of corn, beef, and wheat.

As the canal is completed, Argentina is preparing to battle for our coast-city grain markets on both sides of the continent. She has recently complied with the reciprocal demands of our wheat tariff, so by the removal of her wheat-products duty her wheat, like her corn and beef, can enter our ports absolutely free.

In Argentina's contest with the United States for the control of the free markets of the world for beef, the following table is a graphic account of its course and outcome:

Exports of beef from United States and Argentina to the United Kingdom for certain years.

	United States.	Argentina.
	Hundredweight.	Hundredweight.
1901	3,180,291	771,929
1902	2,290,465	923,748
1903	2,693,920	1,152,211
1904	2,395,836	1,675,271
1905	2,232,206	2,560,132
1906	2,426,344	2,795,913
1907	2,417,604	2,756,965
1908	1,432,142	3,706,245
1909	856,805	4,336,079
1910	477,147	5,041,133
1911	174,350	6,176,503
1912	6,111	6,813,578

It will be noted that in 1901 we were shipping to the United Kingdom 4 pounds to Argentina's 1, while in 1912 they shipped 1,100 pounds to our 1. This suggests why there has come into our free ports since the Underwood tariff law went into effect, and prior to July 1, 1914, 176,333,072 pounds of beef, and of all meats a total of 193,618,598 pounds. Thus is the battle transferred from London, Liverpool, and Glasgow to New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore, while Australia wages a similar contest at Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles.

With the duty barrier removed, the corn contest between the United States and Argentina must take a somewhat similar course. The following table indicates in three representative recent years the relative shipments of corn into the United Kingdom by the United States and Argentina:

Exports of corn from United States and Argentina to the United Kingdom for certain years.

	United States.	Argentina.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
1910	10,667,812	5,485,194
1912	7,834,599	13,464,204
1913	14,106,720	[1] 27,364,857

[1] Trade figures.

It will be noticed that in 1910 we were shipping 2 bushels for Argentina's 1. In 1913 we were shipping 1 bushel to Argentina's 2, and undoubtedly the figures for 1914 will show a much greater ratio in favor of Argentina and against the United States, probably 20 to 1.

As in beef, the corn contest will be shifted from the great free ports of the United Kingdom to the now free ports of the United States.

In the United States in 1913 only 17.3 per cent of our crop, which was 2,446,988,000 bushels, was removed to markets outside of the immediate community in which it was grown. That part amounts to 422,328,024 bushels. Every farmer and grain man knows that every bushel of this amount competes as a market factor with every other bushel of this class. The competition is, of course, affected by the elements of quality, time, and expense of conveying to market. There is not now and has not been heretofore any tariff between any of the States, and in the removal of the duty by the Underwood bill this exemption of tariffs has simply been extended to the world, so far as corn is concerned.

Relatively speaking, little corn and no surplus is produced in any of the seaboard States, where 49 per cent of the people live and where 34 per cent of the cattle, 22 per cent of sheep, 27 per cent of hogs, and 23 per cent of horses are. Sixty-four per cent of the corn is raised in and practically all the United States surplus is moved from the following Northwestern States:

Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

This corn under the old law primarily competed for the seaboard markets of the country. While the bulk of Nebraska or Kansas corn did not actually reach New York or Philadelphia, every bushel of this surplus competed in effect with every bushel of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and Ohio corn which did reach the great consuming points; because if Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Ohio corn did not respond to the fair offers of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, then would Nebraska and Kansas corn be diverted to that market, they being handicapped by a larger freight rate, but at the same time favored by somewhat cheaper land. The same thing is true concerning corn competition among the nations. Every bushel of corn not reasonably required for home consumption is an actual or potential competitor with every bushel of surplus in every other country in the world for those free markets and, to some extent, for those markets charging a duty for importation. But usually that duty is much larger than the difference in transportation, and for that reason hitherto the 15 cents per bushel duty on corn has kept our importations reasonably low.

Corn being the largest and the coarsest of the food cereals, and with a history of uniform less price per pound than the other leading grains, the item of freight becomes a relatively greater factor in corn price than in any of the other grains. The freight rate from the center of the corn surplus producing district to or near the seaboard would be 12 to 14 cents per bushel. From Omaha to the seaboard it is 15 to 18 cents.

From—	To—
	Boston	New York.	Philadelphia.	Baltimore.	Galveston.	New Orleans
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Omaha	0.18	0.17	0.16	0.15	0.19	0.11
Kansas City	.17	.16	.15	.14	.17	.16
Chicago	.10	.08	.07	.07	.18	.18

The foregoing rates were furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission and are higher than figures quoted in the 1912 Yearbook, and which I used on a former occasion. The freight rate from Argentine ports to our ports, not being controlled by any law and corn being carried as a combined ballast and revenue producer, costs from 3 to 5 cents per bushel. So Argentine corn starting from its ports have a great advantage in entering our ports over that sent from the interior points in the United States burdened by heavy railway freight rates. Account should be taken of the increase of shipping to South America and the special effort now being made to market our manufactured articles in that quarter. This will make it especially desirable to load the vessels for the return voyage and corn will furnish the ballast and cargo at once. This point is especially accentuated by the fact that for years Argentina has been cultivating and developing a hard dry corn grain especially adapted to being carried through the heat and moisture of the Tropics.

I acknowledge indebtedness to the Congressman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] for bringing samples of Argentine corn on the floor of the House for inspection on the 6th day of June, 1914. That his purpose was in the nature of derision rather than showing its adaptation for safe and profitable shipment by Argentina, does not materially reduce my gratitude. The average annual amount of corn shipped between the various nations of the earth the last 10 years has been 245,557,706 bushels. It is about 38 per cent of the international shipment of wheat. The following is the rank of nations in corn production:

United States, Argentina, Mexico, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Italy, and Africa.

And the following is a list of the important corn-exporting nations in the order of their rank:

Argentina, United States, Roumania, Russia, Bulgaria, Belgium, and Netherlands.

The following table shows the course of exports of the two leading nations for 10 years:

Calendar years.	Argentina.	United States.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
1904	97,221,000	90,203,000
1905	87,487,000	113,189,000
1906	106,047,000	105,258,000
1907	50,262,000	86,524,000
1908	67,300,000	39,013,000
1909	89,499,000	38,114,000
1910	104,727,000	44,072,000
1911	4,928,000	63,533,000
1912	190,353,000	32,649,000
1913	189,294,000	46,923,000

If the above decade be divided into three periods of three, three, and four years, there will appear some significant facts: First, in 1904, 1905, and 1906 Argentina exported 0.94 bushels to United States 1; second, in 1907, 1908, and 1909 Argentina exported 1.26 bushels to United States 1; third, in 1910, 1911, 1912, and 1913 Argentina exported 2.63 bushels to United States 1.

It will be seen from the foregoing that Argentina is progressively outstripping the United States, which Nation is gradually coming to consume its own production. For 1914 definite figures, of course, are unavailable, but will be in the neighborhood of 30 for Argentina to 1 for the United States.

The importance of grain tariffs was seen by those who looked forward to the time when we would consume in this country nearly all of our food production. It was expected to be of value to the producers then. That time is here, as the next table will demonstrate, but the friends who looked ahead to this period and condition and sought to safeguard the producers find themselves out of power. Those in power, regardless of the producers, have taken the first opportunity to remove the measure of protection which had been wisely made against the day of evenly balanced production and consumption. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND], one of the rather reluctant co-authors of the Underwood farm schedule, whose efforts had saved conditionally a fragment of the wheat protection, speaking from the gubernatorial storm cellar to which he has fled, said [laughter]:

Of course we may expect importations of wheat from Argentina and Canada. We imported wheat before the enactment of the Underwood tariff bill, and we will continue to import it. Our consumption is increasing, and year by year we send less of our wheat abroad, and in the natural course of things the imports will be greater and greater as the consumption in this country increases, because the increase in production is not keeping up with the increase in consumption.

If the observation of Congressman HAMMOND was warranted as to wheat, how much more emphatically does it apply to corn, the increased production of which should be encouraged, as will appear from the following table:

Average percentage of United States wheat and corn crops exported, based on 5-year periods.

Of total average imports of corn for 10 years (241,434,566 bushels), 156,585,937 bushels were imported by countries where it was admitted free; 84,848,629 bushels, or 35 per cent, went into countries where duty had to be paid.

It will be observed that Argentina is the only large corn-producing country excepting our own which does not levy a protective duty upon corn.

It will be noted that for 1912 Argentina exported 51 per cent of all corn exported in the world, while the United States shows that year 8 per cent.

In the first full year of the Underwood tariff law the importations of corn, estimated, will amount to 21,000,000 bushels, which is 8 per cent of the average international shipments of corn by all the nations of the earth for the last 10 years ending with 1912, complete world exports for 1913 or thereafter not being available. A reasonable estimate for 1914 would be, Argentina 75 per cent, United States 2½ per cent.

It will be noted that heretofore corn shipped to the free ports has not greatly exceeded that shipped to the protected ones; but that is changing. Corn producers look with considerable concern, first, on the greatly increased importation of the United States; second, the prospect for greater increase; third, the vast advantage which must accrue to our producing rivals, with none to ourselves; and, fourth, the discouragement to them at being required to produce on high-priced land with high-priced labor, and convey to market at high freight rates, and there compete with the product of low-priced land, low-paid labor, and low freights.

Argentina can afford to carry her corn past Brazil to New York, because if she stopped at Brazil she would have to pay to enter 37 cents per bushel. She could not afford to send it to Chile, as the duty there would be 30 cents per bushel, and the duty of 84 cents per bushel at Venezuela would prohibit her stopping there. So she can ship past every South American port to the United States, as the ocean freight is less to New York than the duty demanded in South American ports.

To all students of corn commerce, the export corn of the world is a large factor in fixing its price throughout corn-using countries. When Congressman RAINEY, from the corn belt of Illinois, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, on June 6, 1914, attempted to defend placing corn on the free list, he spent a great deal of time discussing the amount of corn imported since the tariff law went into effect. His basis of reasoning seemed to be that the imported corn bore but a slight comparison to the corn produced in the United States. That logic might satisfy Members living in the cities of the East, free traders of the South, or Northwestern Democratic Members who seek a palliation of their agricultural constituents' wrath. It would neither satisfy nor deceive any man who understands the corn business. If comparisons are to be made with the element of imports used as a price-fixing influence, the other facts of most importance are, first, how much corn in the United States is sold and moved out of the community of its production; second, how much corn is moved in international trade; third, how much of that corn can be taken at the free ports of the world; and, fourth, how much must be disposed of to countries collecting a duty. Figures illustrating these facts I have already presented.

I submitted two inquiries to the defender of free corn, Mr. RAINEY, of Illinois. First, would he tell the House or furnish for the RECORD statistics of the world exports. This he consented to do if he should regard the statement of sufficient importance. He did not furnish the information, so we must assume that he regarded the corn released from local demands throughout the world and ready for export to any inviting market had nothing to do with fixing or influencing the price of corn at any of these free markets or their vicinities.

The second inquiry was: He having attempted to show that the price of corn was not affected by the imports, why it seemed necessary to throw away 15 cents per bushel revenue which ought to be welcome at our rapidly depleting Treasury. A few million dollars revenue paid for the importation of corn ought to have appealed strongly enough to a tariff-for-revenue-only Democrat and overcome his prejudice against the producer. Permit me to say in passing that the whole theory of the Underwood tariff bill was to favor the consumer and injure or neglect the producer. It is needless to say that that inquiry was not squarely answered nor is it any discredit to the gentleman from Illinois that he has been unable to do so. It would be a reflection upon him and every member of the majority party to say that an extra session was called at large expense to the Government, a bill drafted and passed which released many millions of revenue and did not affect the commercial status in matter of price of the articles of import so largely increased.

That the importation of Argentine corn reduced the price from 8 to 15 cents a bushel is believed by men who understand the grain trade. Every market paper in the United States in quoting prices of corn from day to day refer to the Argentine shipments as an influential factor in influencing prices. During the seven months of this year the market papers have been quoting, as influencing the corn market, Argentine shipments and the prospects of rain or drought. Rainy weather tended to depress corn prices, just like Rainey legislation tended to bring down prices. In the first case, if prices fell the farmer was compensated in increased yield; but in the second instance the price was sent down with no increase of product. One was the benign blessing from heaven, the other the malign act of man. [Applause.]

For decades market papers of the United Kingdom have daily noted the influence upon corn quotations in that Empire of the Argentine crop—in prospect, harvest, and in transit. The markets of America are now in precisely the same condition relative to Argentine corn as the markets of the United Kingdom. The facts are that the importation of corn between October 3, 1913, and October 3, 1914, from Argentina to the United States will probably be greater than the average importation from the same country into the United Kingdom in recent years. Yet in recent years Argentina has exported to the United Kingdom more corn than has the United States, so that Argentine corn either in shipment or subject to shipment is a potential factor in fixing the prices of corn at New York as well as at Liverpool.

Further, during the grain-grading hearings recently held before the Agricultural Committee of the House there was a number of large grain dealers, including exporters and importers, present. Testimony by several was given, and all agreed that the importation of Argentine corn into the United States had materially reduced the market price of corn throughout the United States. And no corn dealer was there or could be produced who questioned those statements. I submit the testimony first of George W. Eddy, of the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Eddy on page 131 of the hearings answered the question propounded by Congressman HAWLEY:

How would it—

Referring to Argentine corn—compare in standard with ours? Would it be No. 2, No. 3, No. 4, or what?

Mr. EDDY. As graded in I think it is graded No. 2 yellow.

On page 132 Congressman MOSS submitted the inquiry:

If we had no surplus and if we were importing that, the amount we imported also, in your judgment, fixes the price. Do you mean to say that that fixes the price at interior points?

Mr. EDDY. It has an effect on the interior points indirectly. We get to a point where we can import Argentine corn that begins to come in and supply the seaboard, and that sets the price and stops the price from advancing, and the corn in the West gets the benefit of the nearer points only instead of giving them the whole broad market of the East as well.

Again on page 133:

Mr. MOSS. And of necessity it must be that was as long as you deal with imports and exports?

Mr. EDDY. Yes; but as a big market proposition on imports of Argentine corn you take away one-quarter of the demand of western corn by importations of Argentine corn, and that has a very decided influence on making the market for the corn we have to sell. * * *

And again:

Mr. HAWLEY. Have you had any information with relation to the Argentine corn being affected by the weevil?

Mr. EDDY. The old corn that was sold was somewhat affected with weevil, but the new corn that has been coming in has been very good. All that I have seen has been excellent, beautiful.

Henry Goemann, large grain dealer of Toledo, Ohio, testified in part as follows:

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; but the one controls the other. They control each other reciprocally, do they not; the cash and future markets?

Mr. GOEMANN. Yes. If you have got more cash grain than you need, the cash grain goes down and future grain also goes down. If you have more cash grain than you want, the future grain goes down under hedging sales, because the consumer will not buy.

Now take an illustration to-day. I am out of business on corn in the old channels in which I was trading up to six months ago, for the reason that the pressure of Argentine corn in all the consuming sections, from Florida to Maine, has driven me out. Now all that is taken away from us because the grain is headed here from Argentina, and the consumer realizes that he can buy Argentine corn cheaper than he can buy mine, and he realises the enormous quantity which he can get, and therefore he buys from hand to mouth, and in his buying from hand to mouth he depresses the price of corn in this country, and in consequence of that competition corn has declined 10 cents a bushel; it has declined in the future market. So the price of cash grain makes the future market to that extent.

Mr. Paddock, of Toledo, large grain dealer, said on page 236 of the hearings:

If it had not been for the importation of Argentine corn, I think the farmers would have realized 10 cents per bushel above the present price of corn on account of its coming.

Grain men generally, with due regard for their business judgment and reputation, will not express a contrary view.

Moreover, our State and Commerce Departments are busy year by year in attempting to open the ports of the world to our corn, and the opening of a port to our corn when accomplished is hailed with great satisfaction and credit is demanded therefor. Because that means the admission of our corn to that new open market gives the shipper opportunity of dividing with the purchaser the amount of the duty theretofore charged. This, of course, means that the local producer meeting with competition must ordinarily suffer a reduction of price.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I decline to yield until I have finished this matter. Then, if I have time, I shall be pleased to answer any question which may be asked, if I am able to do so.

Mr. RUCKER. I have something which is right pertinent along that line of thought.

Mr. SLOAN. Undoubtedly. I know the gentleman always has something pertinent to ask and pertinent to explain.

That the importation of approximately 21,000,000 bushels of corn into this country within a year would not disadvantage the corn farmer is specially pleaded by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. The amount imported is belittled, its effect minified, its possibilities reduced with all the zeal of a special pleader endeavoring to soften the judge or beguile the jury. The alleged insignificance of the importation reminds me of the indiscreet damsel who, when reproached with the evidence of her weakness and folly, said: "It's not so very bad; it's such a little one." [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting speech, and I think we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope the gentleman will withhold that point. I am nearly through with my remarks.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members, a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for tellers, and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. MANN. Tellers for what?

The CHAIRMAN. To ascertain a quorum. It is unheard of, I think.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair counts 103 gentlemen present, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] will proceed. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SLOAN. An amusing feature of Mr. RAINEY'S speech was his attempt to show that a large amount of the Argentine corn did not go to the Chicago market. The gentleman from Illinois might as well have proved that none of the corn went to the Rocky Mountains and climbed Pikes Peak. It mattered not where it went, every bushel competed with every other bushel of corn for sale in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Illinois sought to defend the placing of corn on the free list on the ground that high prices are paid for corn in the late spring and summer, when the farmers have disposed of their corn. This is an ill compliment to the farmer's thrift, which throughout the Northwest prompts him to hold a good share of his surplus until season conditions give some hint to his prospect for a new crop. But more important, if the farmers could not and did not calculate clearly about probable market conditions when they have the two large factors—home production and home market—how less able would they be to cope with a world production and loss of home market?

The defense of the gentleman from Illinois against the importations on account of limited amount of corn actually entered is like the Texas youth who, having shot and killed a man, pleaded extenuating circumstances in that he had not used on him his remaining cartridges. [Applause on the Republican side.]

As the surplus water gathers in the great Mississippi it presses outward upon the banks, yet 90 per cent of the water runs within the limits of the main channel. Of that small surplus which passes first bottom and goes beyond the crop line there is usually not more than 1 per cent of the whole water for the period of the flood. Had the Congressman said to a farmer when but one-half of 1 per cent of the Mississippi flood had run over his crop that he therefore had suffered no damages, he would have received but scant approval and undoubtedly lost a vote. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Twenty-one million bushels is 8 per cent of all the international shipment of corn in all the world, based on 10 years' average. Members will understand the effect of that when we recall that the increase in the shipment of all our manufactured articles under the new tariff law over last year's importations is only 8¼ per cent. We are reminded by looking about us of the number of men thrown out of employment, the amount of wages reduced, the number of factories closed or hours reduced, the idle cars, and stagnated business arising out of that tariff change or incident thereto. It will suggest an appreciation of what an importation of 8 per cent of all the exportable corn of the world into America means.

Farmers are entitled to the benefits of a steady home market, so that if crops are short they may have some compensation in steady liberal prices, because in good years and bad their necessities demand constant purchases from other industries. In that way steady markets and prices for home demands are kept up.

The farmers in the years of their failure or famine should not be at the mercy of the competition of the great bumper crops raised beyond the seas. [Applause on the Republican side.] In the end the effect of the present policy will be to discourage home production and leave the consumers at the mercy of the foreign producer and speculator, uncontrolled by the check of our laws.

The much-vaunted foreign market has, under the demonstration of this foreign war, been proving itself the delusion and snare which protectionists have been teaching for generations. This demonstration has made overnight many southern free traders into protectionists. It has made them also would-be builders of cotton factories and zealous advocates of ship subsidies. Even gold Democrats are talking cotton money to relieve them from defaults of foreign cotton markets. They all agree now that busy mills of New England should be preferred to the unreachable markets beyond the seas. This great world war is teaching all not to depend on foreign ships, foreign markets, or foreign free-trade tariff policies. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When the next tariff bill or bills are written, their sponsors, instead of claiming as a virtue any growth of our "industries beyond the seas," will assert, "What America needs that we will produce; what she desires that we will make." We prefer the markets of New York and Chicago to the markets of London and Liverpool. The busy looms of Lowell will be preferred to the whirling spindles of Manchester; the furnaces of Pittsburgh and Birmingham to the imprisoned fire and flame of all Europe. We prefer the American laborer to the toiler of the Continent. And we will protect our farmers against the husbandmen anywhere else on earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Corn being the leading cereal and first of our products, we should guard it well, lest coming in contact with the weevily product of Argentina its high station will be reduced. Until last October a moderate tariff kept out the Argentine corn and weevil. When Great Britain more than a century and a third ago was furthering her special revenue as well as other schemes for Americans she brought into the country the Hessian fly, which has been a scourge to our wheat and a burden to our farmers ever since. Again, when foreign thought in more subtle form has control of our revenue policy they are bringing in the Argentine weevil to fret our corn raisers for generations to come. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We should be jealous of King Corn's integrity and primacy. It is the one great cereal planted and grown upon the square. Cultivated in lawful atmosphere, it is a sustaining food for man and beast. When wheat failed, barley was scarce, and rye did not crop, it furnished food for the Nation and was the source of "meal and meat." Reared in outlawry, it liquefies in secrecy into the delectable delight of mountain dew. [Applause.] It is the one important grain grown by the original owners of America.

Its silver plume waved here before the helmet of the Florentine glistened on the Western Continent. Its breastplate of gold preceded the discovery of California nuggets. That gold, combined with alfalfa emerald, makes marbled beef, rainbow bacon, and ruby ham. It has contributed more to northwestern thrift and southern hospitality than any other product of American soil. It is entitled to every protection that the Nation, so dependent upon it, can give, and that which hath been unjustly taken from it should be righteously restored. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] such time as he may wish to use.

[Mr. GILLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman on the other side [Mr. BARNHART] use some of his time?

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] desired 15 minutes, but he does not seem to be present at this moment. I will yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, owing to my well-known attitude in regard to our merchant marine, and because of the fact that I have been one of the most active men in the United States in urging the restoration of the American flag to the sea, and that the bill passed a few days ago was opposed to what I have always advocated, I have been asked why I did not actively oppose that measure. I do not assume that my attitude upon this bill is of sufficient public importance to justify me in taking up the time of the House even for a few minutes; but feeling that just at this time, in view of the great European war and the duties and responsibilities that it has placed upon this Nation, I might in so doing be able in a measure to do a service to my country, is the explanation why I shall take a few moments in regard to the matter.

I wish, briefly, first to explain the conditions on the Pacific coast, and especially in the Pacific Northwest, as related to this legislation.

When the Underwood tariff bill was pending before Congress we pleaded for protection of the industries of the Northwest. The answer we received was to place practically every one of our products on the free list. The tariff was taken from lumber, shingles, and dairy and farm products. The Underwood tariff law benefited British Columbia; it injured the State of Washington. The Chinaman, the Hindu, and the Japanese were given preference by that law to the American citizen.

That law closed our mills and opened those of British Columbia. More shingles came into the United States from British Columbia during the month of last June than ever came into this country before in any one year, and this amount is constantly increasing. These shingles are produced almost entirely by oriental labor. With free lumber and free shingles, and with the British Columbia manufacturer having the benefit of cheap free ships manned by cheap foreign crews that carry their product to the Atlantic coast markets of this country, the only hope left for the lumber and shingle industry of my State was the advantage given American ships through the Panama Canal. Then this advantage, to placate the demands of the transcontinental railroads and to cover up the blunders in Mexico, was taken from us. This action increased the rate on every thousand feet of lumber sent from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic, either by rail or water, $1.50, and gave the benefit of that $1.50 to the manufacturer of British Columbia.

Through a defect in our navigation laws the Pacific Northwest is denied absolutely the protection of the coastwise law between the Atlantic and Pacific ports, an unjust and infamous discrimination against a small portion of our own country. I have tried in vain to have this remedied. But the distinguished leader of the majority frankly told me that he would not permit it to be done in the tariff law, and also stated that he would do all that he could to prevent it being changed by any other method. With that statement the Pacific Northwest is absolutely helpless until the Republican Party shall again come into power. Perhaps under a Republican administration it will be possible to have all laws, whether wise or unwise, apply alike to all parts of our common country.

To-day it is not a question of whether the trade from Puget Sound through the Panama Canal with our Atlantic coast shall be carried in American ships or foreign ships; it will be carried mostly in foreign ships. The only question is, Shall those ships run from Puget Sound or from British Columbia? To illustrate, a foreign ship loads with lumber and shingles at Vancouver. It unloads that cargo at Philadelphia. There it loads with steel and furniture, goes back through the canal and unloads the cargo at Vancouver, British Columbia. That steel and furniture are placed on the cars and sent to Bellingham, Spokane, and other points in the United States without the payment of a single cent of duty or charges of any kind or character. The cars that carry this cargo into the various portions of the United States are then loaded with lumber or shingles or wheat or other freight, whether this freight be produced in the United States or British Columbia, is taken to Vancouver, and there on a foreign ship it is sent to any American port without being required to pay charges of any kind.

These are the conditions we face at Seattle and on Puget Sound. We are not protected by the laws of our own country as every other section is protected. We do not have the equal rights guaranteed to us under the Constitution. We are discriminated against by law, one of the most infamous forms of tyranny. And this Democratic Congress has steadfastly refused to even consider changing this injustice, and by denying American ships free passage through the Panama Canal they took from us our last defense. This discrimination against this one section of our country is inexcusable and vital to the prosperity of the Pacific Northwest.

Under these circumstances I felt that the people of that section were justified in demanding foreign ships for the trade from coast to coast and that such provision should be incorporated in the bill. I felt that they were justified in making this demand, as the man is justified in taking life in self-defense. What under ordinary circumstances may be a crime then becomes a commendable act. But as the bill was finally passed we were denied on the Pacific coast all relief. As it has happened only too often before, the South and the East were cared for and the Pacific coast was neglected. Then why did I not make vigorous protest against the bill as finally passed? This is my answer:

To-day the greatest war of the world is devastating the earth. The greatest tragedy since men have for love or hate murdered men is now being enacted. Never before was the earth so wet with human blood as it is to-day. The map of the world is being changed. Kingdoms and empires are crumbling. The history of the human race is being written by a giant and bloody hand. Modern civilization is showing its latent savagery. When the end will come nor what the result will be no earthly wisdom can tell.

We think of the white upturned faces of the dead, the anguish and suffering of the wounded and dying, the grief and anguish of widows and orphans, the indescribable suffering and misery, poverty and want that must follow. As we think of all these countless and helpless victims of human greed, ambition, and ignorance the appalling horror of it oppresses and almost stupefies us. We can not but feel that this measureless sacrifice is useless. But let us hope that it will not be in vain.

We know that most of those who go down to cruel death are innocent victims of a power they could not control and of a conflict that they did not desire. The great common people of all the nations involved loved peace, they hated war. There is no same man in all the world to-day but who deplores this bloody conflict. Ours is the one great nation of the earth not involved. Upon us more than upon any other nation rests the responsibility of keeping in a position of absolute neutrality, not only for our own sake but for the sake of humanity. [Applause.]

Never before in the history of the world has so great a responsibility rested upon a nation as rests upon us now. Never before in the history of the human race has there come such a great opportunity to benefit mankind as comes to us to-day.

What we must do above all things else is to remain neutral, to remain at peace with all, and maintain that peace with honor.

Every true American citizen unreservedly approves the sentiments upon this proposition so beautifully and patriotically expressed by the President and by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The words of these two great men in this trying time should be an inspiration and a guiding star to the American people. [Applause.]

In this awful conflict we pity all; we favor none. That many dangerous conditions will come is almost certain. Men or nations clutching at each other's throats engaged in a death struggle do not stop to reason. They are controlled by the insanity of hate. They do desperate things. We should remember these facts and not be swept from cool judgment by their acts. When such emergency arises, then is the time for self-control, for dispassionate thinking, for careful speaking, on the part of every true American that we may remain at peace, act justly, and discharge faithfully the mighty duty that fate has placed upon us.

This Nation to-day suffers commercially beyond computation, but we should not grow hysterical or resentful. Let us determine that overanxiety on the part of some for the dollar shall not involve us in this conflict. [Applause.] Our commercial injury is great, but it is as nothing compared with the calamities of war.

Let us be thankful that conditions are no worse, and pray to Him who holds the destiny of nations in the hollow of His hand that we may not become involved in this awful conflict. [Applause.]

It is said that the Democratic Party will profit by this war. It may be so. If it profits by ably and patriotically performing its duty in this hour of our country's need, then all good citizens will rejoice. [Applause.] If it attempts to play politics and tries to save the party instead of the country, then the curse of this people and of generations yet unborn will fall upon it. [Applause.]

In this emergency there should be no party and no politics. My partisanship stops at the boundaries of my own country. Beyond that, when it is this Nation against the rest of the world, then we are all Americans. [Applause.]

While this shipping bill as it has been passed did not meet my judgment, and while I believe it will be disappointing in its immediate results and disastrous in the end, and while I feared that it might lead us into great danger, I did not actively oppose it; and why? Because the President had asked for this legislation. He believed it wise. He is in a better position to judge of the conditions than anyone else. In this trying hour his responsibilities are the greatest. No one doubts his integrity or his patriotism. And I did not propose by any word or act of mine to do anything, standing as we are in the shadow of this great world war, that could possibly be construed, either at home or abroad, to the effect that the people of this country were not in this mighty emergency, without regard to party or politics, standing as one man back of the President. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] such time as he may occupy.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I submit a few figures and facts relating to finance, commerce, and business conditions:

[1] Free on and after Oct. 3, 1913.
[2] Duty reduced from $30 per head where value not over $150, 25 per cent ad valorem where value over $150 per head, to 10 per cent ad valorem on all.
[3] Live poultry reduced from 3 cents per pound to 1 cent per pound, dead from 5 cents per pound to 2 cents per pound.
[4] Either placed on the free list or duty reduced about one-half.
[5] Free on and after Oct. 3, 1913. Duty was 15 cents per bushel.
[6] Duty reduced from 15 cents per bushel to 6 cents per bushel.
[7] Free if imported from countries which impose no duties on like imports from United States, otherwise 10 cents per bushel. Duty was 25 cents per bushel.
[8] Duty reduced from $4 per ton to $2 per ton.
[9] Free on and after Oct. 3, 1913. Duty was 25 per cent ad valorem.
[10] Included in all other meat products prior to July 1, 1913.
[11] Free on and after Oct. 3, 1913. Duty was 4 cents per pound.
[12] Free under both laws.
[13] Duty reduced from 6 cents per pound to 2½ cents per pound.
[14] Duty reduced from 6 cents per pound to ad valorem duty equivalent to about 4 cents per pound.
[15] Included in all other articles prior to Oct. 3, 1913.
[16] Duty reduced from 45 cents per bushel to 25 cents per bushel.

[19] Duty reduced from 25 per cent ad valorem to 15 per cent ad valorem.
[20] Practically all free of duty since Dec. 1, 1913.
[21] Per cent of increase of wool for 7 months under new law over same period of last year under old law, 96 per cent.
[22] Per cent of increase figured on quantities, where quantities are given, otherwise on values.
[23] Per cents of increase figured on values.
[24] Total value of all meat products, except sausage, bologna, and bologna casings, for 9 months, $19,672,625; for June, 1914, $3,606,094, compared with $125,498 for June, 1913.
[25] No figures for months under old law. Quantity and value figured as two-thirds of year.

The period of nine months ending with July 1 showed an increase over the corresponding nine-month period under the old law of 159 per cent. This period is significant in this, that it covers three-fourths of the fiscal year of 1914 and does not include any part of the period influenced by anticipation or actual occurrence of the European war. These figures show not only an enormous increase of farm products, but a progressive one.

RAILWAY REVENUES DECREASED.

The net income of the railways of the United States per mile for the year ended June 30, 1914, was the lowest for a decade, according to information compiled by the Bureau of Railway News and Statistics from the monthly reports of the roads to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Operating expenses increased $35,191,237 and the net operating income, after deducting taxes, decreased $130,276,210 from the previous year. The bulletin says that, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission's figures, between 1907 and 1913 the average freight receipts of the railways dropped from 7.59 mills per ton-mile to 7.20 mills.

Slason Thompson, director of the bureau, in analyzing the figures, says:

There is no need of searching into the byways and dark passages of railway finance to find out what ails the railways. If they are being "looted"—as runs the favorite phrase of their inquisitors—it is by conditions as inexorable in their results as the laws of nature. Between 1907 and 1913 the average freight receipts of the railways was hammered down from 7.59 mills per ton-mile to 4.29 mills. These are commission's figures. That reduction of three-tenths of a mill reduced the railway revenues by a round $90,000,000.

In 1907 the average daily wage of railway employees was $2.20; last year it was $2.49. That little increase of over 29 cents a day added over $160,000,000 to the railway pay roll. Put these two items together and you have a quarter of a billion dollars lost in one year over which the railways have no more control than of the wind which bloweth where it listeth.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES IDLE.

A most conservative estimate of the railway employees June 1, 1914, made by the Railroad Employer, was from 175,000 to 200,000, and in addition a large number whose working hours were reduced or their income lessened.

IDLE RAILWAY FREIGHT CARS.

On a page of the New York Times of July 12 we find the following:

How the idle cars of this year have compared in number with those a year ago is shown below:

	1914	1913
Jan. 15	214,889	28,430
Feb. 1	209,678	37,260
Feb. 14	197,052	22,183
Mar. 1	153,907	31,581
Mar. 14	124,805	37,775
Apr. 1	139,512	57,988
Apr. 15	212,869	57,498
May 1	228,870	39,799
May 15	238,042	50,294
May 31	241,502	50,508
June 15	231,334	63,927
July 1	219,545	63,704

The enormous disparity between the numbers of freight cars lying idle in 1913 and 1914 amounts to an absolute refutation of the claim that business conditions are sound. When, as on May 31, 1914, the number of idle cars exceeded by 190,000 the number that were idle on the same date in 1913, four months before the Underwood tariff went into operation and when business was at the normal mark of protection prosperity, there was manifestly something wrong with business. That something wrong remained up to July 1, 1914. It still remains, and all the optimistic reports which newspapers can work up will not wipe out that fact.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

For several years preceding the enactment of the Underwood tariff what might be called full employment was given to all our wage earners; in other words, with the exceptions due to illness, worthlessness and strikes, and other rare exceptions which must always exist everywhere in the country, all who wanted work and were worthy of it could obtain it.

Immediately upon the operation of the new tariff, October 3, 1913, conditions began to change, and in a few months it was estimated that from three to five million had been thrown out of employment. It is, of course, difficult to get an exact census of the unemployed, but we can obtain an approximate idea of the situation. For instance, we know that about 200,000 railroad employees are out of work; we know that some 200,000 men usually employed in the lumber industry are now idle; we know that over 200,000 textile operatives have been thrown out of work, and as many more in the iron and steel industry; in fact, it has been stated that over one-half million iron and steel workers and those of kindred industries are idle. Fully 100,000 miners are idle, and many thousands engaged in car making and locomotive shops.

From day to day during the past six months figures have been given showing the closing of shops in every part of the country. First, it would be a thousand thrown out of employment, then a few hundred, until newspapers which have followed the figures assume that some 3,000,000 men are idle. But this by no means tells the whole story. There are thousands and thousands of female wage earners idle in every phase of industry; there have been thousands upon thousands of clerks and clerical employees laid off; there have been thousands of day laborers thrown out of work, and many thousands in the trades, such as carpenters, masons, bricklayers, plumbers, painters, decorators, and so on through the list.

According to a recent census report 35,000,000 people in the country were engaged in gainful occupations in 1910, and that number was largely increased during the following three years. Let us, however, take that as a basis and assume that only 10 per cent have become idle under the new tariff; that would give us 3,500,000; but we know that in many occupations and industries fully one-fifth, or 20 per cent, have been thrown out of employment. If that proportion covered the whole country, it would make 7,000,000 idle. It seems, then, that we may take a middle ground between the two extremes and safely assume that at least 15 per cent of our people have been thrown out of employment. That means that over 5,000,000 wage earners are idle; and assuming a loss of $2 a day for each, that would be a loss in wages of $10,000,000 a day, or at the rate of $3,000,000,000 a year.

The Underwood tariff seems, then, not only to have been a blunder and a failure, but a crime against the American wage earner.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to my colleague on the committee, Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to enter into an extended discussion of this bill, but to briefly state some of the reasons why, in the judgment of the committee, this bill should be enacted into law, and inasmuch as my time is limited I trust that I may not be interrupted.

At this time when the administration and its leaders in Congress are endeavoring to find some way in which to increase the revenue to meet the current expenses of the Government the consideration of the printing bill now before the House is most opportune. Suggestions have frequently been made upon the floor of this House with regard to the best method for raising additional revenue, but very little has been done toward curtailing the expenditures of the Government. What the country needs most at this time is to cease all unnecessary expenditures, and the practice of more economy in conducting the business of the Government would be appreciated by all the people. The passage of the bill now under consideration will help accomplish this to the extent of nearly $1,000,000 per year, as is shown by the complete and exhaustive report accompanying the bill. The necessity for more practical business men in our lawmaking bodies is becoming generally recognized, as well as the fact that the successful management of the financial affairs of the Government is purely a business proposition. At this time it would seem in order to call attention to the rapid increase in the expenditures of the Government from $5 per capita in 1890 to over $7 per capita in 1910. I desire to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the New York Sun of August 12 with reference to the increase of Government expenses.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

Since European war has upset the trade of the world and entangled the finances of the United States the necessity of filling the Treasury has engaged the attention of the authorities at Washington, in the executive departments and the Congress.

They have conversed together about the practicability of new taxes and the feasibility of increasing the imposts now in force.

They have speculated as to the sums that might be brought into the Treasury in this way and that, and they have assured the Nation that, come what may, their ingenuity will be equal to the task of devising means to fill the strong box.

It is an alarming, although not a novel, fact that in all the dissertations on this pressing and important subject not one suggestion has been made that deficit in income should be met, even in part, by economy of expenditure.

There has not been a single recommendation that expenses should be reduced and the outflow of money from the Treasury checked, or that any bureau or department of Government should contribute to the mollification of the present situation by restraining its enterprises, reducing its salary list, or even withholding itself from increased and costly activities.

It is accepted at Washington, and apparently throughout the country, that the extravagances of to-day mark the possible minimum of governmental cost. It is assumed that no bureau, no department, no expert, no clerk can be dispensed with, and that the sole solution of the problem is the collection of more taxes from the people of this country.

How has the taxpayer fared in a generation of American National Government consisting of administrations each of which was elected pledged to the strictest economy, and in two cases on platforms specifically denouncing the wasteful conduct of their predecessors? A few figures tell.

In 1890 the population of continental United States was 62,947,714. The expenditures of the Government were $318,040,710. The per capita cost in that year was $5 plus.

In 1900 the population was 75,994,575. The expenditures were $487,713,791. The per capita tax was $6.40 plus.

In 1910 the population was 91,972,266. The ordinary expenditures were $659,705,391. The per capita cost that year was $7.10 minus.

We were told in 1900 that there had been an extraordinary necessity for greater expenditure consequent on our War with Spain. The per capita increase over 1890 was about $1.40. In the period between 1900 and 1910 we had no war to add to our burdens and no foreign complications by which to account for a heavier tax. Yet the per capita charge of ordinary expenditures grew between 1900 and 1910 by 70 cents, or one-half the increase of the preceding decade, with its war and the subsequent appearance of the United States as a "world power."

The present Congress, elected to office on the solemn assurance that it would reduce expenditures and safeguard the people's money, has shown in its acts a persistent indifference to its pledges that has called from its sane leaders stinging rebukes on the floor of the House of Representatives. The Executive, engrossed with reformatory projects of a far-reaching nature, has shown no disposition to exercise its power in the cause of economy. To-day the members of the majority in the Congress and the appointed officers of the executive departments concentrate their efforts not on the redemption of their promise of economy, not to save in a financial crisis money to the citizens, but in the devising of new means of extracting money from men tortured by fears of the business future, bled by extravagant State, county, and city expenses, and harassed by the threat of interferences and restraints that will kill their enterprises, baffle initiative, and render labor fruitless.

We commend the present attitude of this Government with respect to its domestic affairs to the earnest study of all the citizens. We believe that study will amply reward those who indulge in it. We conceive that somewhere within the United States there must exist a politician capable of recognizing the straits to which his country is reduced and competent to estimate the dimensions of the public opportunity offered to a man of sense, courage, and real patriotism.

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. The need for a revision of the printing laws is apparent when we take into consideration that it has been nearly 20 years since a general revision of these laws has been made, and conditions have very materially changed, so much so that it was deemed necessary to undertake the framing of new laws to meet the present-day requirements. This work was started in the Sixty-first Congress, and in the Sixty-second Congress the Committee on Printing of the House and Senate prepared bills, after careful investigation and hearings had been given to all interested parties. The Senate passed a printing bill during the closing days of the Sixty-second Congress, but it reached the House too late for consideration in that session. While no act was finally passed by the Sixty-second Congress, the data obtained by the committees was of great value in framing the bill now under discussion. During the present Congress the Committee on Printing held numerous hearings and gave the subject careful thought, with the result that the bill now under consideration has many new features. The bill as introduced by the chairman of the committee, Mr. BARNHART, represents the views of the committee, which was unanimous in reporting the bill to the House. I might say that a bill almost identical to this has been introduced and reported in the Senate. Every commission, committee, or expert who has investigated the subject of public printing and binding in recent years has recommended that a complete revision of the printing laws must be made by Congress before the Government Printing Office can be placed upon a proper business basis. It is therefore apparent that the necessity for a revision of the printing laws is an established fact.

In the discussion of this bill the question of the control of the Government Printing Office by Congress has been raised. In the first place I desire to call attention to the fact that under existing laws the control of the Government Printing Office is vested in Congress and has been since its establishment in 1860, and for many years the head of that office was designated as the Congressional Printer, for the reason that the Government Printing Office was established primarily for the work of Congress and only incidentally for other branches of the Government. Congress never relinquished its control over that great office, and I do not believe the time will ever come when it will. It is absolutely necessary that the Government Printing Office be ever responsive to the needs and requirements of this great body. In 1874 the title of the Congressional Printer was changed to that of Public Printer, but it does not appear that this was done with any intention by Congress of relinquishing its control over the Government Printing Office. The Joint Committee on Printing was created by a law of Congress approved August 3, 1846. The joint committee from that date to this has consisted of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House, who constitute, in fact, a board of directors for the Government Printing Office. The duties of this joint committee have been enlarged from time to time by Congress. Some form of supervision over the Government Printing Office by Congress is essential because of their close relationship. The committee is of the opinion that the Government Printing Office should be entirely under the control of Congress and believes that such supervision can best be exercised through the Joint Committee on Printing. Under existing law it has considerable authority, and the pending bill has been framed with the view of defining that authority.

The matter of Government printing is a very important one, as it involves the expenditure of a large amount of money each year, and the expenses of the Government for printing is of necessity increasing annually. Now, if by the enactment of this bill into law we can increase the efficiency of the Government Printing Office, provide a more economical distribution of public documents, and thus reduce the cost of printing and binding, we will have accomplished a great service. Opposition to any measure that so radically changes the law as is in force now and has been in force for the past 20 years may be expected. At the same time those opposing the measure know that abuses have arisen under the present law that should be corrected. We do not claim perfection for the bill as reported, and it may be that amendments will be proposed by Members of long service in the House whose experience would aid in suggesting wherein the bill could be improved and strengthened, and the committee will welcome such amendments, but, on the other hand, will oppose unfriendly amendments offered for the purpose of defeating the measure. Legislation, as we know, is a matter of compromise, and the ideal can not always be attained; but we believe that the passage of this bill will be a large step in the right direction. The report accompanying this bill shows the enormous waste in the printing and distribution of Government publications. This is one of the most important features of the bill under discussion, and the committee, after careful investigation, believes that the proposed bill will save the Government nearly a million dollars per year. It would, therefore, seem well worth while to pass this bill and give it a trial, as the present system of distribution of documents should be improved, and we believe this bill will produce the desired result if enacted into law. It is not the intention or purpose to curtail the present publicity, which is vital to good government, but rather to aid such publicity by providing more efficient methods and abolishing useless waste and extravagance.

As stated in the report, the bill has been prepared with the purpose of vesting the necessary control over the Government Printing Office in Congress through the Joint Committee on Printing, while at the same time every effort has been made not to hamper the Public Printer in any way in the proper management of that great establishment. Upon the Public Printer rests the burden for the successful operation of that plant. The committee's only purpose is to safeguard the interest that Congress and the people have in the honest and efficient conduct of that great office.

One of the principal causes for the present waste in public documents is the extravagance in duplicating printed and bound congressional and departmental publications. Another great loss is due to the defective method of distribution. The valuation plan for the distribution of public documents to Members of Congress, as proposed in the bill, will correct this, in a large measure, and give to each Member the documents that will be of most value to his constituents. This valuation plan is, without doubt, the most important part of the bill and will likely meet with considerable opposition from those who do not favor any change from the present method of distribution. During the consideration of the bill I will have something further to say regarding this feature of the bill.

Much time has been spent in the preparation of this measure, and the committee has devoted many months to the most careful consideration of the bill. It has been repeatedly submitted to all branches of the Government interested and has received most favorable commendation from those persons having a knowledge of the defects of the present law and the urgent need for a radical reform in the Government's method of printing and distributing its publications. The printed hearings, reports, and other publications relating to public printing and binding which were studied in the preparation of this bill fill more than 2,000 pages. It can not, therefore, be said that the bill has not received adequate consideration. This bill, if enacted into law, will effect great economy in printing and binding without decreasing the efficiency of the service. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 21 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, two weeks ago last Monday the House passed as an emergency measure a bill providing for the registration under the American flag of certain vessels now flying the foreign flag. The bill was somewhat delayed in the Senate, but I believe the conference report was rejected in the Senate and the House bill agreed to in the Senate one week ago yesterday. It was stated to the House when it was presented that it was a matter of very great urgency, and we passed it without any consideration by a committee.

I do not know just when the bill was signed by the President and became a law, but I assume that it was sent to him at least one week ago. We have various other emergency matters that are likely to be presented and urged on the ground that we must act immediately because of a great emergency. Although the ship-registry bill was passed by both Houses more than a week ago, the regulations in accordance with it, to be prescribed by the President, have not been issued. The great emergency was in Congress. Apparently the departments that deal with these great emergencies forget the emergency as soon as we have acted.

We appropriated two and three-quarters million dollars some weeks ago to bring home American citizens abroad. I have no disposition to criticize, but I wonder why we can not get the machinery in motion so as to actually take care of the people?

On the American ship-registry bill I have this telegram from the president of the United States Steel Co. That was one of the companies which we were told had a number of vessels under a foreign flag that was desired to be registered under the American flag in accordance with the terms of this bill. The telegram reads:

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Our steamer Bantu, loaded for Uruguay and Argentina, and steamer Crofton Hall, loaded for Chile and Peru, in New York Harbor ready to sail. Steamer Kentra ready for grain or cotton, Atlantic coast or Gulf. Steamer Santa Rosalia, Puget Sound, ready for wheat. Steamers San Francisco, Bucoa Ventura, Ikaria, Industry, Matoppo, and several others available for transportation of American products, and we are patiently awaiting issuance of proclamation in order to be in an intelligent position as to whether we can put these steamers under American flag immediately and operate them competitively with steamers in over-sea trade under other flags, as our steamers are being held in various ports at very heavy expense. Would appreciate advices as to about when information will be available to enable us to determine what to do. Capt. Dollar and other American owners of ships now under foreign flags are in the same position. The provisions of law prescribing that the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States should be suspended for a period of at least three years, and the provisions of law requiring survey, inspection, and measurement by officers of the United States should also be suspended for the same period. Further, until the war-risk insurance bill has passed the House and becomes effective we would be without such insurance in the event of transfer.

JAMES A. FARRELL,
President United States Steel Corporation.

Under the law which was passed by both Houses more than a week ago the President is authorized to make suspensions proposed, and to permit these ships to take out American registry. Although we acted in the House with, I believe, 40 minutes' discussion, these owners of these vessels that are now in port, ready to sail, held for the regulations that are to be made, are, as they say, patiently waiting—I suppose they are watchfully waiting—until some one in connection with the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of Navigation, or the administration can find time out of the great amount of time they have consumed in sending legislation for us to enact to apply that which we have enacted and adopt regulations and let these vessels register and do business. [Applause.]

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides for a needed codification of the printing laws, and with some modifications and amendments, the wisdom of which have, I think, been clearly indicated, the bill should pass. It is not my purpose, however, to discuss the features of this bill, but to utilize the time which has been allotted to me to point out and call attention to the effect on the wool and sheep industry of the agitation for free wool which went on for a number of years and was consummated in the passage of the Underwood tariff bill.

The Underwood tariff act of October 3, 1913, placed raw wool on the free list, beginning December 1, and considerably reduced the duties on partly manufactured wool and on woolen goods, beginning January 1 following the passage of the bill. It is a well-understood fact that a majority of the Democratic membership of the House of Representatives favored a small duty on wool; in fact, a bill placing a duty of 15 per cent on raw wool had passed the House a few months before the passage of the Underwood bill. It is also well understood that the Democratic majority was forced to accept free wool by the President, in which position it was understood the President was strongly supported by the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan.

ATTITUDE TOWARD THE WOOL INDUSTRY.

During the discussion of the Underwood tariff bill quite a number of gentlemen on the Democratic side expressed their views as to the effect of free wool. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Peters, called attention to the fact that under free wool the American woolen manufacturers would have an advantage, in that they would be relieved from the necessity of paying duty on their wool. Democrats from the manufacturing districts seemed to base their support of free wool largely on the theory that free wool would benefit the manufacturing industries. Democrats from city districts and large consuming centers based their contention for free wool on the proposition that free wool would make wool and cloth cheaper, and thereby benefit the people of the country other than wool producers.

In none of these speeches made on the Democratic side in support of free wool was there any contention that the farmers would secure as much for their wool under free trade in wool as they would receive under protection. Such a contention would have been ridiculous coming from men who were basing their support of free wool on the theory that wool must be cheaper in order that cloth might be cheaper. For instance, Mr. DIXON, of Indiana, during the course of the debate said:

We intend to reduce the price of woolen goods by taking the tax off all wool, in order to allow our people to buy woolen goods for winter.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] said:

We want to legislate in the interest of the consumer. I want to give the people of the country cheaper woolen clothing.

And so forth. There was no pretense on the part of anyone supporting free wool that they did not expect free wool to make wool cheaper than it would be under protection.

NOT "LEGITIMATE" FROM DEMOCRATIC VIEWPOINT.

The proposition was to sacrifice the woolgrower on the altar of the public good. There was no claim that he would not sell his wool cheaper under free wool than under protected wool. In fact, after the Underwood bill had passed the House and gone to the Senate and was there being discussed, I had a colloquy with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] relative to the general effect of the bill if it became a law. I asked him if I had his promise that if any labor or industries were injured under their tariff legislation the injustice would be rectified by legislation, to which he replied that if they found, "after thorough investigation, that an industry, or the labor employed in it, had been injured, you may rest assured that this side of the House will rectify any wrong which has been done." I then asked him if this promise included the wool and sugar industries, to which he replied, "Oh, there are some propositions that we recognize are not entitled to be classed as legitimate industries."

In view of this attitude of the Democratic Party, I was fully justified in making the statement that I did in that debate—that the Democratic Party does not consider the sheep and wool and woolen industry "entitled to any consideration as to its present status or future prospects in the framing of the tariff bill." It is true there were Democratic Members of Congress from woolgrowing States who were fearful of the effect of free wool on their political fortunes. If their solicitude had been for the interest of their sheep growers rather than for their own political interests, they would have been more entitled to consideration at the hands of those engaged in sheep raising and woolgrowing.

REVIEW OF THE SITUATION.

It is, of course, impossible to absolutely demonstrate the ultimate effect of free wool on the wool industry of the United States from less than a year of trial. Much depends upon the effect of reduced duties on American wool and woolen manufactures, for if American mills are closed it is immaterial whether or no there is a duty on wool. Much depends also on the world's supply of wool, as basic prices are fixed by the law of supply and demand. While, therefore, I do not expect to give any final demonstration of the effect of free wool, I do expect to be able to show that every opinion of the students of protection as to the injurious effect of free wool and excessive reduction of the rates of duty on many classes of woolen goods has been verified, and more particularly to demonstrate that none of the claims and prophecies made by those who favored free wool, and heavy cuts in rates on woolen goods, as to benefits to be secured through these tariff changes have been fulfilled.

In order to intelligently discuss the wool situation it is necessary to go back to 1909, when the Payne tariff bill became a law. At that time and for a number of years previous the protective principle seemed securely established and the wool and woolen industries were reasonably normal. Wool prices for that year, therefore, represent normal conditions under protection. The Payne bill became a law August 5, 1909, retaining the same duties on wool which were carried in the Dingley law.

Very soon after the passage of the Payne tariff bill, however, certain influences hostile to various provisions of the act and to the Republican administration united in a fierce attack on Schedule K, the immediate effect of which was to depress the price of American wool through the fear of tariff changes. The Democratic victory of 1912, bringing the certainty of tariff reductions and the probability of free wool, still further depressed wool prices, and when, on May 8, 1913, the Underwood bill passed the House, with wool on the free list, wool went to and even below a free-trade basis. In fact, to all intents and purposes, wool has been on the free list since May 8, 1913.

ADVANCE EFFECT OF TARIFF CHANGES.

The depressing effect of the threat and certainty of free wool, and reduced rates on woolen goods, on wool prices in advance of the actual change of law has been illustrated a number of times in our history. The threat of free wool under Cleveland began its depressing effect on wool prices long before the Wilson bill became a law, and the lowest prices received by American woolgrowers, compared with foreign prices, during the entire period of the Wilson bill depression occurred before the bill became a statute.

History has repeated itself under the Underwood bill, and with scarcely a variation. Up to this time the lowest prices paid in the recent past for American wool, as compared with foreign prices for similar wool, was after free wool was assured by the passage of the Underwood bill in the House, but before it actually became a law.

It is this fact, coupled with an advance in the world's price of wool in the past year, that gives a few of our Democratic friends the excuse for their noisy assertion that wool has been advanced in price since the passage of the Underwood bill. During the discussion on March 30, 1912, of the Democratic bill of 1912, revising Schedule K, I called attention to the depressing effect of agitation for and threat of free wool in advance of change of tariff rates, as follows:

> The wool business is the most peculiar in the world. It is a business with regard to which it is possible in times of tariff agitation and uncertainty to press the price of the domestic clip down almost to a free-trade basis, and I have known of clips—not many, but some—being sold in my country that did not, in my opinion, bring more than 2 or 3 cents above a free-trade basis.
> Mr. LONGWORTH. Is not one of the reasons the fact that the rate of interest is so high that very often the sheep raiser can not afford to hold his clip for a favorable market, but must sell it?
>
> Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman understands the situation thoroughly. The rate of interest is high. The sheep business is oftentimes carried on to a considerable extent on credit. The buyer refuses to buy in times of agitation, but stands ready to pick up a clip that must be sold at a sacrifice, and under those conditions is able to secure them at times at but little above a free-trade basis.
> Unfortunately that low rate is never reflected in the price which the ultimate consumer pays. If it was, the people, as a whole, would benefit by our losses; but I doubt if the American people, as a whole, have benefited by the failure of the western woolgrower, the merino-wool grower, to receive the full amount he was expected to receive from the rate carried in our tariff laws.
> I do not mean to say that our protection has always or generally been that low. In my opinion we had been receiving on an average, and when there was not too much agitation an actual protection, of between 7 and 8 cents on the grease pound. Perhaps that is a rather high estimate.
>
> Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?
>
> Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.
>
> Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The price is quite low now, is it not?
> Mr. MONDELL. The price is quite low; not as low as it is sometimes and not as high as it ought to be in order to give us anything like the benefit of the present tariff. Our flock masters are offered, I am told, between 16 and 17 cents for the average fleece at this time. Anyone who knows about foreign prices knows that it is not high enough to cover the foreign cost of the same wool, adding the full amount of our duty.

When there is a threat of lower tariff rates on wool, buyers decline to buy except for immediate needs unless they can buy at a price which will not involve a loss if a lower rate goes into effect before the wool is disposed of. When free wool and low rates on woolens became certain early in 1913, many American mills closed down or curtailed operations and refused to buy wool except at a price that would save them from loss if free wool and low duties on cloth and clothing went into effect before the goods made from the wool so purchased were disposed of. This natural attitude of buyers who bought to sell again, and of manufacturers who bought to make into cloth, sent the price of wool down to and, in some cases, below a free-trade basis, even before the free-trade law was in effect.

I was asked on the floor of the House some time ago if wool prices were not somewhat higher this year than last, and having in mind my own section of the country, that from which the so-called territorial wools come, I said that prices were somewhat higher. This statement has been seized upon by some Democratic brethren from woolgrowing districts as a final and conclusive admission of the wisdom of Democratic tariff policies. It is significant that no Democrat from a nonmanufacturing or other nonsheep-raising district echoed this sentiment, and even Democrats from sheep-raising districts who have any sense of logic, refrained from attempting to excuse their action in voting for free wool, on the proclaimed theory that it would make wool and clothing cheaper, by the claim that since the time they voted for cheap wool it had grown dearer. It takes a rash Democrat, with a low estimate of the intelligence of his people, to attempt to fool them with that sort of political sleight-of-hand performance.

The fact is the clip of 1913 was to all intents and purposes sold under free wool just as much as the clip of 1914 was; and sold, according to Department of Agriculture figures, on the average at about the same price.

Mr. BOWDLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Having gone into the matter carefully I have discovered that the condition of higher prices this year than last was a condition largely local to the western country, for the official figures of the Agricultural Department and of the American Wool Manufacturers' Association show that the average price of wool this year and last the country over was approximately the same. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOWDLE. Does the gentleman mean to tell this House that free trade in wool is intended to guarantee a low price in wool?

Mr. MONDELL. Do I mean to tell the House free trade in wool is intended to guarantee a low price of wool—I do not know just what the gentlemen who voted for free wool intended to guarantee; if they made any kind of a guaranty, they would be greatly troubled just now to make their guaranty good.

Mr. BOWDLE. Is not the gentleman claiming that the Democratic Party has defaulted on that guaranty?

Mr. MONDELL. I should say it has defaulted just as it has on all other guaranties on their tariff bill.

Mr. BOWDLE. Then it is the gentleman's claim free trade is intended to guarantee a low price in wool, is that right?

Mr. MONDELL. Free trade in wool is advocated by certain people on the theory that it helps the manufacturer. Those are the gentlemen who come from manufacturing districts like the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Peters. Without regard to what the effect is on anybody else it is, I believe, the claim of such gentlemen it does help the manufacturer. If we are to have free wool and a high duty on woolen goods, I guess gentlemen are correct in saying that would help the manufacturer. Other gentlemen want free wool on the theory that it will make clothing cheaper for every one, without regard to the interest of the woolgrower. A lot of Members voted for free wool because the Democratic caucus bound them to. Our contention is that free wool destroys or hampers seriously and reduces the volume of one of the most important industries under the flag, an industry without which no civilized people can live and prosper, and that in so doing it does not make clothing any cheaper and therefore does not help the people generally. [Applause on the Republican side.] And the figures which I propose to give in connection with this brief outline demonstrate those facts, it seems to me, beyond peradventure.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. HELVERING. The gentleman says it hampers and destroys the particular industry to which he has referred. Does the gentleman have reference in stating that to those gentlemen who went out of the sheep business in his country on his advocacy of the low price of wool after the Underwood tariff went into effect?

Mr. MONDELL. I never advocated a low price for wool. I never advocated and never desired cheaper agricultural products of any kind than the man who produces them can afford to receive and get a fair income. People have continued in the sheep business in my country in the face of these discouraging conditions to a greater extent than in other parts of the Union, but they have suffered severely.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But suppose the price of wool had gone down, as the gentleman from Wyoming confidently expected it would do, would not the price of the manufactured article—that is, the articles manufactured from wool—have gone down?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not confidently expect wool would go below the prices of last year, unless the prices of wool went down the world over, which it did not, but went up. I do not think the prices of clothing would have gone down, even though the price of wool did. The price of wool this year and last, the kind of wool we grow out in my country, was 5 cents a pound less than it was in 1909, a normal year of protection, and yet you can not get anything in the shape of a woolen garment cheaper than you could in 1909, which proves that while there has been a crippling reduction owing to tariff agitation it has not reduced the price of woolen goods.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman please tell us what section of the United States has suffered so severely from the result of the Underwood tariff law in the sheep and wool industry? The gentleman says his section has not, but certain sections have. Please tell us where they are.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not say my section has not. The intermountain region has suffered by reason of this agitation for free wool, and its consummation in the prices that its wool clip brought this year as compared with a normal year under protection certainly not less than $6,000,000.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield further? If it has suffered as a result of the increase is it likely to continue to suffer?

Mr. MONDELL. There has not been an increase since the agitation for free wool began. There has been a steady decrease below the prices of former protective years. Now, if gentlemen will allow me, I will proceed with my discussion.

NORMAL PROTECTION VERSUS THREATENED AND ACTUAL FREE TRADE.

In view of the effect of tariff agitation on wool prices, I propose to go back to the normal protective year of 1909 and some years before for a comparison with prices under the threat of free trade and its practical accomplishment in May, 1913, and its consummation in December. The figures which I shall quote in the discussion of this matter I shall take from Farmers' Bulletin 575 of the Department of Agriculture or from equally trustworthy sources, and I shall print at the close of my remarks tables containing the figures to which I shall refer and indicating the source from which obtained. The average wholesale price of "Ohio fine" unwashed wool in the Boston market for the five years 1905 to 1909, inclusive, and for the year 1909 was 25½ cents, as given by the Farmers' Bulletin to which I have referred. The same authority gives the average price of the same wool for the following years as follows: 1910, 24 cents; 1911, 20 cents; 1912, 23 cents. The first four months of 1913 the wholesale price of this wool in Boston was about 24 cents, but with the passage through the House of Representatives of the Underwood bill the price dropped to 21 and then to 20 cents, and continued between those figures to the end of 1913. In February of 1914 there was a slight rise in the Boston price of this wool, and from that time on until the end of May it maintained a price of about 22 cents, running as high at one time as 23 cents.

From a study of these official figures it will be seen that the Boston prices of "Ohio fine" wool averaged much higher under protection than it has since the passage by the House of Representatives of the Underwood tariff bill. In 1909 and before, when prices were normal and not depressed by tariff agitation, the price averaged at least 3½ cents higher per pound than since free wool was decreed.

The table from the bulletin to which I have referred does not give quotations of territorial wools—that is, merino and cross-bred wools from the Rocky Mountain and range States—and therefore I take my figures in regard to that class of wool from tables furnished me by the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, whose figures are the most reliable to be obtained anywhere and universally accepted as being trustworthy. From these tables I find that the average price of Territorial staple, fine, and fine medium unwashed wool on the Boston market for 1909 was 26 cents per pound; for 1910, approximately 24 cents a pound; for 1911, 22 cents a pound; for 1912, 23¾ cents a pound; for 1913, 21 cents a pound; and for 1914 up to June 30, 21 cents a pound.

From a reading of these figures it is very clear that the Boston price of territorial wools was considerably higher under normal conditions of protection than it has been under the Underwood bill, being 5 cents a pound higher in 1909 than in 1914. The agitation against the wool schedule in 1910, which is well remembered, brought the wholesale price of these wools down 2 cents a pound, and still they averaged 4 cents a pound higher than this year. The continued agitation of 1911 reduced the price somewhat lower, but still a cent higher than this year; and in 1912 the average price was 2¾ cents higher than this year. When, however, in May, 1913, it became certain that we were to have free wool, the price dropped from 24 cents to 22 cents and on down to 19½ cents, or an average of 21 cents—the same, according to these tables, as the average price up to the last of June of this year.

These tables would seem to indicate that my affirmative answer on the floor of the House to the inquiry as to whether the price of wool had advanced was not entirely correct, though it pleased the Democrats, who, having voted for cheap wool, are now taking consolation out of the claim that wool is higher. My statement was based on my knowledge of the selling prices of wool in my State of Wyoming and was correct as to the situation there. It will be noted by a reference to the table that the average price of 21 cents for 1913 does not properly measure the price at which the bulk of the clip was sold by the producer, as the wholesale price had dropped to 21 cents in April, and then fell immediately to 20 cents and then to 19½ cents, and the grower of territorial wools did, on the average, get a somewhat higher price this year than last; his clip, however, was generally lighter.

I have given figures based on the Boston price rather than the local price of wools, because, as everyone knows who is at all familiar with the wool market, it is impossible to strike a fair average among the wide ranges of prices paid locally, as that price depends on the distance of the clip from the market, the character of the clip, and many other conditions. The Boston price, while it is always somewhat above the local price, bears the same relation to the local price at all times, so that, while it does not reflect every local rise and fall and variation, it affords the only index of the rise and fall of the commodity as a whole. I have, however, made careful inquiries as to the prices received by the growers for five large representative Wyoming wool clips for the years 1909 to 1914, inclusive, and I find that the prices paid for these clips for the years in question averaged as follows: 1909, 20¼ cents; 1910, 19¼ cents; 1911, 18¼ cents; 1912, 17¾ cents; 1913, 13¼ cents; 1914, 17¾ cents a pound. These figures, it will be seen, reflect the changes of the Boston market.

WHAT THESE FIGURES SHOW.

I propose to discuss briefly what these figures indicate as to the loss to the American woolgrower on account of the agitation for and the final placing of wool on the free list. The markets of the world present no conditions which have warranted American wool being lower at any time since than it averaged in 1909. There is no reason other than tariff agitation and change why he should not have received as much or more than he received that year, for the foreign price has frequently been higher. The only reason or cause for the lower prices since 1909 has been the agitation for and the final passage of a free-wool bill. Free trade in wool actually went into effect in May, 1913, when the Underwood bill passed the House, so far as prices were concerned.

On the basis of the difference in the average prices of "Ohio fine," unwashed, in Boston, in 1909 and 1914, the shrinkage in value of a 328,000,000-pound clip, which was the clip for 1909, is approximately $13,000,000, but that does not represent the total loss to the wool industry of the country by reason of the constant Democratic agitation for free trade in wool, for that agitation so discouraged the farmers and flockmasters of the country that they reduced their flocks to such an extent that the wool clip of 1914 was but 270,000,000 pounds, or more than 58,000,000 pounds less than the clip of 1909. Assuming as low an average price as 21 cents a pound wholesale, this represents a loss of approximately $12,000,000 in the value of the wool clip as between the years referred to, or a total loss to the wool industry in 1914, as compared with 1909, of $25,000,000. If we make this comparison on territorial wools, both as to the wool actually produced in 1914 and as to the shortage between 1909 and 1914, we will have a figure of loss several million dollars greater.

The wools classed as "Ohio fine" and "medium," and produced in the territory of which Ohio is the center, constitute about 25 per cent of the wool product of the United States; therefore the loss to this section of the country in its wool industry in one season of free trade, as compared with an average year under protection, has been about six and a half million dollars, on the basis of a clip equal to that of 1909, or a loss of upwards of $3,000,000 on the wool actually sold this year. The Territorial wools, so called, produced in the Rocky Mountain and Plains country, comprise approximately half of the wool product of the country. The loss to the wool industry of that region in this year of free trade, as compared with 1909, an average year of protection, has been approximately $12,000,000, if figured on the basis of the 1909 clip, or more than $6,000,000 on the basis of the clip actually shorn.

But these comparisons only take into consideration the present year of free trade, as compared with a normal year under protection. If we carry our comparisons further and apply them to the year 1913, when the passage through the House of the Underwood bill in the month of May, carrying a free-wool provision, put us on a free-wool basis and sent the price of "Ohio fine" and Territorial wools to below 20 cents on the Boston market, and correspondingly lower on the farms and ranges, we will discover a loss even greater than that of 1914, for, while the clip was a trifle heavier, the average price was as low, and particularly in the territorial region considerably lower, than in 1914.

LOSS, 1909 TO 1914.

In order, however, to in any wise adequately measure the loss to the sheep growers of the country and the country at large by reason of the Democratic agitation for free wool, and its final consummation in the Underwood bill, we must consider the steady and progressive reduction in the clip and in prices for the entire period from the normal protection year of 1909 to the time when the evils of free trade were fully consummated by the Underwood bill. The total loss in the reduction of the wool clip of the country in the period from 1909 to 1914, as compared with the clip for 1909, amounts to more than 130,000,000 pounds, which at 1909 prices would have brought about $30,000,000 in Boston; at this year's prices about $[illegible],000,000. This enormous loss not only fell on the woolgrower in the reduction of the amount of his income, but it was a loss to the entire country, because of the fact that we were compelled to pay foreigners $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 which otherwise would have remained in our own country and among our own people scattered over the woolgrowing States. If, now, we figure the actual loss to the wool industry, based on the reduced prices received during this period of agitation for free trade and of actual free trade, as compared with the normal protection year of 1909, we find an average loss of 3½ cents a pound at a most conservative estimate, which, on the total of 1,500,000,000 pounds produced and sold since 1909, amounts to over $64,000,000.

As these figures are necessarily based on the Boston rather than the local prices, it may be claimed that the totals are higher than the actual loss to the grower, but that contention is not sound as to the difference in prices from year to year, for, as I have already stated, while the Boston price is always higher than the average local price it bears the same relation to the local price approximately at all times. It can therefore be stated conservatively that the actual loss to the woolgrowers of the country on wool alone, owing to free-trade agitation and free trade in fact since 1909, has been in reduced product $25,000,000 and in reduction in returns for product actually sold $60,000,000.

These figures, staggering as they are, do not take into consideration any loss to the wool and sheep industry except the loss on wool alone. The loss in numbers and price of sheep has been very great, and when we take into consideration the advancing cost of meat, the loss in sheep is even a greater menace and calamity, if possible, than the loss of wool. In 1909 we had over 42,000,000 sheep other than lambs; in 1914 approximately 34,000,000, a loss of over 8,000,000, or about 20 per cent; thus one of our important sources of meat supply dwindles in face of the hostile attitude of the Democratic Party, and thus the Democratic Party aids in advancing the cost of living while claiming to be laboring for its reduction.

THE PRESENT AND THE FUTURE.

Serious and significant as these figures are, they do not begin to measure the greater losses which a continuation of free trade in wool are certain to bring. The wool free traders are themselves apparently greatly surprised that wool did not go lower than it did this year compared with last year's prices. They had failed to take into consideration the fact that the 1913 clip was also sold under conditions of practical free trade. The Democrats in the woolgrowing regions, underestimating the intelligence of the people, are comparing the prices of these two years in their attempt to excuse free wool on the ground that it does not do any harm. That sort of sophistry will not fool anyone, for even the people who are not interested in the growing of wool will say that there is no reason why the Government should lose $20,000,000 in revenue in seven months if no one is going to be benefited through lower prices. Democrats from nonwoolgrowing districts who promised cheaper wool and cheaper clothing through free wool are explaining to their constituents that free wool did not make wool cheaper in 1914, because conditions were unusual and abnormal. They tell them that if they will only wait another year the promise of cheaper wool for the manufacturer will come true. This is a Democratic contention which is sound, and which will probably be verified. Conditions this year have been unusual and abnormal: First, because we are comparing wool prices with the prices of last year under virtual free trade; and, second, because the manufacturing conditions have affected the domestic wool market in an unusual way.

I have already explained the conditions under which the wool clip of 1913 was sold. Free trade had been decreed by the Democratic caucus and clinched by the passage of the Underwood bill May 8. The manufacturers knew that the goods they made from the wool then bought would not be sold until free trade in wool was a fact and lower rates on woolen goods provided. They therefore bought on a free-trade basis or not at all. American wools thus purchased were, of course, cheaper than foreign wools of the same grades could be laid down duty paid, and this fact led the manufacturers to make up their samples for the fall and winter of 1913 and the spring and summer of 1914 very largely from American wool. When in the spring of this year the manufacturers who had been buying from hand to mouth came to purchase the 1914 clip to make up goods to fill their orders they naturally competed sharply with each other. Their samples having been made largely of American wools, they could not, to a very large extent, substitute foreign wools, and out of this competition, brought about by these unusual conditions, prices this spring and early summer, particularly of fine wool, were maintained several cents a pound higher than they would ordinarily be under free trade in wool.

This brings us right back to the basic principle of the matter. Free trade in wool under normal conditions does and will make wool cheaper than under protection; that has always been the Democratic contention as well as the Republican contention. If it does not, what reason can be found anywhere or given by anyone outside of an insane asylum for the loss to the Government of millions of revenue? The only difference between the Democratic and the Republican contentions have been with regard to the final cost to those who use woolen goods. We have contended that a reasonable protection on wool does help the woolgrower, without injuring the user of woolen goods. In a speech which I made in the House of Representatives March 30, 1912, I expressed the opinion, after careful study of market quotations for years, that the duty which has heretofore been carried on wool gave the domestic woolgrower from 5 to 7 cents a pound more for his wool than he would get under free trade, assuming normal conditions. In other words, our wool has under normal conditions of protection been about that much higher than approximately the same class of foreign wool. No one with any reasonable claim to ordinary horse sense will assert that under normal free-trade conditions American wool laid down in Boston will be worth any more than the same grade of foreign wool. If in the future foreign wool shall be high, American wool, even under free trade, will bring a fair price; but if foreign wool is low, American wool will be correspondingly low. On the basis of the present condition of the world's wool trade and markets the Wyoming clips which I have heretofore referred to as bringing an average of 17½ cents a pound this year would have, under normal conditions of protection, brought from 23 to 25 cents a pound; so that the actual loss this year on the wool clip of the State, based on the difference between the prices received and those our flockmasters would have had under normal protective conditions is certainly not less than two and one-half million dollars. And yet Democratic editors and Democratic politicians wonder why those directly and indirectly interested in this great industry do not like the policies of the Democratic Party. Every year of free wool will cause as great a loss as compared with normal conditions under protection.

IF I WERE A FREE TRADER.

If I were a believer in free trade in wool; if I placed the wool industry in the catagory of industries that were not legitimate, as Mr. UNDERWOOD did in response to my inquiry; if I considered sheep and wool growers "mendicants" and "supplicants for Government favors," as some gentlemen on the Democratic side have called them; if I believed, as the wool free traders claim to, that cheap wool necessarily meant cheap clothes, and therefore the woolgrower should, in the interest of all the people, be left without protection to his industry—if I held these views I believe I would try to have the courage of my convictions and say that we must have free trade in wool whatever the effect on the industry. A few gentlemen on the Democratic side have the courage to do this, but they are very few, for those who feel that way realize that if one advocates action which is intended to reduce the value of the products of a large number of the American people on the theory that it serves the best interest of a larger number of people one is in all fairness bound to prove that the action proposed or taken will or does actually produce benefits that fully compensate for the losses it entails.

Having demonstrated the great losses to those engaged in the wool and sheep industry through the threat and the fact of free trade in wool, the loss to the body of our citizenship by reason of the decline of a great industry, the necessity for sending abroad for what we should produce at home, the reduction of the natural food supply, I now call upon those who favor the policies which produce these results to show how and where, directly or indirectly, anyone has been benefited by the hostile attitude of the Democratic Party to the wool industry and the losses that have come to the industry thereby.

The fact is there have been no benefits in our country through free wool, and if free wool and agitation for it had done no harm it would not be justified, for it has done no good to the people at large, and it is wicked to even put a great industry in jeopardy when the people generally are not helped thereby.

FREE WOOL, TAXED GOAT HAIR.

Before I proceed to demonstrate that the people generally have not been helped by free wool, but large numbers of them besides the woolgrowers injured, I desire for a moment to call attention to the striking difference in the attitude of the Democratic Party toward sheep and wool and some other industries. This Democratic Congress does not all come from the South. Quite a sprinkling of its Members come from free-trade districts in great importing cities like New York, districts composed very largely of people who are handlers and consumers and not producers of articles. But the southern contingent has the important places on committees; they are a majority of the Democratic majority and they control in all things. Wool is not produced in the South to any considerable extent. Goats are raised in Texas. Wool is on the free list; goat hair is protected. The South has no interest in wool, but the South grows rice, and rice is heavily protected, though it really needs no protection, and wool, which does need protection, is on the free list.

WOOL VERSUS COTTON.

The South grows cotton. It is one of our greatest products for export and consumption. It is entitled to every reasonable consideration, and always received it from the Republican Party. But while the Democratic Party as now controlled in Congress has outlawed wool they find it hard to do enough for their great staple. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money is spent each year to check the ravages of the boll weevil. Legislation is secured for expensive regulation of grades and samples of cotton and for the regulation of dealing in cotton. Vast sums are spent for cotton seed to be distributed by southern Congressmen. Now it is proposed to issue Government notes against cotton in warehouses in order to enable the cotton producer to hold his product indefinitely, in the hope of getting a higher price for it from the consumer. If there ever was a more striking example of prejudice on the one hand and favoritism on the other than this, I do not recall it.

A wool producer is a "mendicant" if he wants fair treatment; a cotton grower is a coddled favorite. A woolgrower is not entitled to any consideration, they say, and his product must be cheapened; but a cotton grower has every encouragement in getting the highest possible price for his product. The cotton-growing industry and region gets all sorts of favors from a Democratic Congress. It required almost superhuman effort to get an appropriation of $10,000 for the importation of some sheep from Australia which, it is hoped, will aid a little in the struggle to keep the industry alive under free trade.

WHO HAS BENEFITED?

I turn now to the consideration of the question of who has benefited by the agitation for and the consummation of free trade in wool. Have the people been getting cheaper woolen cloth, clothing, and goods by reason of free wool? That inquiry would seem to be foreclosed by the claim of Democrats from wool-producing districts that wool has advanced in price since it went on the free list. If that is so, and so far as it is so, it, of course, precludes the possibility of cheaper clothing. In fact, if wool has gone up under free trade, as some claim—and we invoked free trade to make wool and clothing cheaper—what have we accomplished?

Under normal conditions wool is bound to be cheaper, compared with foreign wool, under free trade than under protection. He who advocates free trade in wool and still insists that wool prices will not be reduced as compared with foreign prices simply makes himself ridiculous, for if free trade does not cheapen to the consumer why have free trade and lose the revenue? If it does cheapen to the consumer, of course the producer loses. The trouble with the Democratic editors and politicians in woolgrowing sections is that they want to stand in with and defend their party, which is for free trade, in order to get cheap wool and at the same time with the woolgrower, who does not want cheap wool.

I have taken the trouble to make some careful inquiries. I have even attended some "bargain" sales to learn if the average of prices of woolen goods have been lowered. I find, as everyone else has found, that they have not, but that people are paying substantially the same prices for woolen goods that they paid before the passage of the Underwood bill. In fact, I find the prices of some fancy woolen goods have advanced, and I have been told of cases in which foreign woolen goods, which have been imported in large quantities at the reduced rate of duty fixed by the Underwood bill, have, by reason of their being attractive to the trade, been sold at considerably higher prices than similar values bought a year ago or than American goods of higher manufacturing cost are bringing now.

NO REDUCTION IN LIVING COST.

There has been no reduction in the cost of living, so far as woolen goods are concerned, under the Underwood bill, as there has not been in other lines. Sugar is higher, boots and shoes are higher, leather and harness are higher; automobile tires and golf balls are the only articles that went down, and now automobile tires have gone up again higher than ever. I do not use golf balls, so I do not know about them. If there is to be any reduction in the cost of woolen goods by reason of free trade in wool, it should have come long since, for the threat of free trade in wool sent domestic wool last year—that is, the season of 1913—to a free-trade basis and below, as I have heretofore stated. That being the case the American woolen goods of last winter, as well as of this summer, so far as they were made of domestic wool, were made out of wool bought as cheaply or more cheaply than the same wools are selling for now. Therefore our free-trade friends can not reasonably claim that cheaper goods are coming later as a result of their tariff legislation. Their cheap goods are already long overdue.

THE EFFECT ON LABOR.

How about the effect on labor of free wool and its accompanying lower rates on woolen goods? These lower woolen rates were, with free wool, to make goods cheaper; they have not done so. How has the change affected labor? The wage rates on farms and ranches, so far as they have been affected at all, have been lowered. In fact, no one has heard of any wage rate anywhere that has been increased by the Underwood tariff bill.

In the woolen mills and factories labor has been having a hard time to secure steady employment. A considerable portion of the woolen machinery of the country is idle, and unless the European war shall greatly change the situation many more mills will be idle, owing to the continually increased flood of imports. Already the increased importation of woolen goods represents a loss of employment to labor of not less than four or five million dollars.

LOSS OF REVENUE.

The Democratic leaders are searching about for some means of securing additional revenue, they say, to make up for the lack of importations due to the European war; in fact, to head off a deficit which has been long foreseen and which I prophesied on this floor several months ago would have to be provided for. This situation in which the party in power finds itself emphasizes the amount of revenue the Government has lost by reason of the placing of wool on the free list. Wool went to the free list on December 1, and up to July 1, on a total importation of 207,827,282 pounds of wool, we have lost a revenue of $19,405,901.67, which would have been collected under the Payne bill. Here is an importation of wool in seven months in an amount nearly equal to three-quarters of our domestic clip displacing home-grown wool and bringing no revenue to the Government when it is so badly in need of it.

WESTERN WOOL FREE, EASTERN MANUFACTURERS PROTECTED.

Democratic editors and politicians in woolgrowing States, not having the courage to denounce the action of their party as now controlled in sacrificing a great industry in their region, would have us think that free trade is a good thing for wool and in line with the general party policy. If free trade in the products of woolgrowing regions is good policy, why is it not good policy in manufacturing sections? The Republican tariff rate on class 1 and class 2 wool amounted on an ad valorem basis to about 34 per cent. The Underwood bill placed wool on the free list, but placed duties averaging 35 per cent on woolen goods and as high as 50 per cent on some. Manufacturing industries need protection, but how can Democrats in woolgrowing States defend high tariff rates on the products of the eastern manufacturer while approving free trade for the products of their own people? Nothing but thick-and-thin partisanship, which places party success above the prosperity and happiness of our own neighbors, can approve such an attitude.

THE EFFECT IN BRIEF.

The Democratic Party, while adhering to a haphazard, hit-or-miss, and wholly illogical protective policy in spots and places and in regard to certain favored products and sections, has declared war on the wool industry and placed all its products on the free list.

The result of this Democratic free-wool agitation since 1909 and its actual consummation in 1913 has been—

To reduce the number of sheep in the United States more than 8,000,000—a value of over $32,000,000;

To reduce the wool clip of the United States more than 130,000,000 pounds, or over $30,000,000;

To reduce the income of growers of "Ohio" wool more than $6,000,000 on the 1914 free-trade clip and prices as compared with the 1909 protection clip and prices;

To reduce the income of Territorial woolgrowers more than $12,000,000 on the 1914 clip and prices under free trade as compared with the 1909 clip and prices under protection;

To reduce the income of the wool producers of the country during this period of agitation and consummation of free trade at least $85,000,000;

To reduce the income of the Nation on loss of revenues on imported wool in seven months nearly $20,000,000; and

To deprive textile workers of at least $5,000,000 of wages on account of increased importations of woolen goods.

Does anyone know of any good which has been accomplished by or through these losses? I will yield to any Democrat who knows of anyone on our side of the Atlantic who has been benefited. I know of no such. I could, however, fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with accounts—all before the present war—of foreign mills and factories running overtime to supply goods for the American market, while 30 to 35 per cent of our wool manufacturing machinery stands idle. How long will the American people tolerate a policy which produces such results? Not for long, in my opinion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk begin the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be a Joint Committee on Printing, consisting of three members of the Committee on Printing of the Senate and three members of the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, to be designated by the Committee on Printing of the Senate and by the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, respectively.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We are now commencing to read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule, and I think that the Members of the House ought to receive reasonable notice, so that they may be here, and I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred gentlemen are present, a quorum, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I notice in this section it provides for the Joint Committee on Printing, to be designated by the Committee on Printing of the Senate and by the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives. And I do not see that there is any objection to the use of the word "designated." In the next section of the bill it says that the members of the joint committee who are so designated shall continue members of said committee until their successors are chosen as provided for in that section. Of course the word "chosen" has a variety of meanings, and I suppose would be fairly apt in this connection if it were necessary to use it. The word "chosen" as used in the Constitution of the United States refers invariably to an election. Electors are chosen, and various other officers of the Government are chosen, but wherever the term "chosen" is used in the Constitution it refers, not to an appointment or a designation, but to an election.

Now, I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], with his usually nice use of the English language, will make these two words comport with each other. If "designated" is used in paragraph 1, then, when you reach paragraph 2 it ought to read:

Until their successors are designated as provided for herein.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, so far as the committee on the House side is concerned, it is really appointed, as the committee understands it, and on the Senate side it is neither chosen nor appointed, but designated.

Mr. MANN. But the Committee on Printing of the House, of course, is elected by the House under the existing rules, and this section requires that out of that committee, which consists of only three members, the committee shall designate three members to go on the Joint Committee on Printing. This is the language:

That there shall be a Joint Committee on Printing, consisting of three members of the Committee on Printing of the Senate and three members of the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, to be designated by the Committee on Printing of the Senate and by the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, respectively.

Mr. BARNHART. But does not the gentleman from Illinois concede that it might be possible that it could be the duty of a committee to designate, and after this committee was designated, it would be chosen?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the use of the word "designated." But you provide that the three Members of the House shall be designated by the House Committee on Printing. And when you use that term in that way it seems to me that is the term you ought to use in paragraph 2—namely, "designated."

Mr. BARNHART. That might be if the methods of choosing in both the House and the Senate were the same, but that does not necessarily follow. We elect our committee here; that is, our membership on the Joint Committee on Printing. On the Senate side there are 9 of the Senate Committee on Printing. We have 3 and the Senate has 9, and from that 9 they choose 3. In the House we designate these 3, and we do not elect them at all, because by virtue of their being on the Printing Committee they become members of the joint committee.

Mr. MANN. You do not elect them at all. Under the terms of the law, which I presume are never complied with technically—this is the existing law—you designate three members of the House Committee on Printing as members of the Joint Committee on Printing. Of course, as there are three members of the House committee you go without any designation at all.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman will observe on page 2 it is said they are chosen "as provided herein."

Mr. MANN. As provided in this section.

Mr. BARNHART. As provided previously, as a matter of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Why not, to make it just as clear or clearer and avoid any question as to the meaning of the word "chosen," and not changing the meaning of the word as it is in the Constitution, say "until their successors are designated as provided for in this section"?

Mr. BARNHART. I would not have any objection, but I do not see that it is material.

Mr. MANN. I do not say that it is material, and yet where we have certain words used in the Constitution of the United States with a fixed meaning, and there is no occasion for changing that meaning, I think it is wisest in legislation to take the meaning in the Constitution of those words and retain them.

Mr. BARNHART. I am perfectly willing when we come to paragraph 2 in section 1 that we shall take that matter up. But I think the word "designated" should be left in the opening chapter of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not see anything against that at all, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BARNHART. And when we come to paragraph 2 in section 1, if it is thought best to change the word "chosen" to "designated," I do not believe the committee would have any material objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1. PAR. 2. The members of the Joint Committee on Printing who are reelected to the succeeding Congress shall continue as members of said committee until their successors are chosen as provided for in this section: Provided, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, on the last day of a Congress, appoint Members of their respective Houses who have been elected to the succeeding Congress to fill the vacancies then about to occur on said committee, and such appointments shall continue until their successors are chosen as provided for herein. The Joint Committee on Printing as constituted by this section shall exercise all the powers and duties devolving upon said committee under the law, and it may authorize one or more of its members to exercise such of its functions as necessity shall require when Congress is not in session.

Mr. BARNHART and Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is recognized.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that, in line 8, the word "chosen" shall be stricken out and the word "designated" substituted therefor.

Mr. MANN. Also in line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "chosen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "designated."

Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "chosen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "designated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech made by my colleague and my good friend, Mr. ALLAN B. WALSH, of New Jersey, on July 4, at Basking Ridge, Somerset County, N. J., the subject being the Declaration of Independence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech of his colleague, Mr. WALSH, delivered on the 4th of last July. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. ALLAN B. WALSH, OF NEW JERSEY, ON JULY 4, AT BASKING RIDGE, SOMERSET COUNTY, N. J.

"I consider it one of the very best signs of our times, ladies and gentlemen, that the people all over the country are taking a genuine interest in the sane celebration of the Fourth of July.

"It has practically ceased to be a day of noisy boastfulness and somewhat rowdy enthusiasm and is fast coming to be what it ought to be—a day for the manifestation of intelligent and enthusiastic patriotism. It is most fitting that our celebrations take into account the education of the rising generation. The purpose of the day's observance should be made plain to them in every possible way, so that even the youngest may grasp the meaning of it and develop a more patriotic spirit through its yearly observance. Not all the day should be given over to mere jollification. Some little time at least should be set apart for historic consideration, through which we may arrive at a better understanding of the declaration which forms the very beginning of our history as a nation. This will serve largely to keep us in touch with it, and we must remember that it is a mighty important document, not only for us who pride ourselves on our American citizenship but also for the whole world.

"When we pause to consider the purpose of our celebration to-day our minds most naturally travel back to that other 4th of July, 138 years ago, when we had the courage and audacity to get up on our own feet and proclaim ourselves an independent people, fully capable of taking care of ourselves, fully determined to tolerate no longer the oppressive conditions to which we had been reduced by England, and ready to prove our determination, if need be, by force of arms. Well, we had to prove it, and we succeeded in doing so, and it is a matter of history of which we can be justly proud that we not only have stayed on our own feet ever since, but have in the short space of 138 years advanced to the very forefront of the nations of the earth in power, in population, and in prosperity, as well as in that ardent love of liberty and manhood which inspired the great declaration of our independence. And, please God, we shall continue to occupy this proud position.

"Only those who are deep students of the history that has been made since the Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776, can give you any adequate idea of the influence it has had on the history of the whole world, even to the present day. It is a document that should be read and pondered over by every genuine American citizen, for it concerns us all; and we of the present day, just as truly as our fathers in the past, reap the benefits of its proclamation to the world. While it is true that the Nation has not always lived up to the full content of the document, still it must be admitted that the spirit of the declaration was always there, always understood, and always animating the people in their struggle toward better government. Not only that, but its spirit was breathed abroad upon the peoples of the earth and the eyes of all the oppressed of the world turned longingly toward the new Nation as to a refuge—a blessed land, where every man, no matter how humbly born, might stretch himself up to the full height of his manhood, where the man born in the log cabin might one day be the occupant of the White House.

"We are rather prone to believe that the Declaration of Independence was a statement of conditions already existing in the American Colonies. It was very far from being that, however. As a matter of fact, it was a challenge and a protest against oppressive conditions which existed under the British rule. It was, I might say, a platform or a promise of better conditions to be realized, if possible, under an independent government, which recognizes the inherent dignity of man and proclaims all free and equal before the law with a right to a voice in the government. And it was our brave proclamation of these principles to the world as the foundations on which we were to build as a Nation that has made this 'the day we celebrate' beyond all others in our national calendar.

"It seems to be a fact of history that in times of great human need great men arise; and the bitter struggle for our liberty as a Nation which followed fast on our Declaration of Independence brought into prominence one of the greatest men of all time whose name will ever be associated with the day. In the history of the world there have been many wise men, many great statesmen, many great soldiers and great philanthropists, but I doubt if you can find anyone among them all who measures up so thoroughly to all the conditions of greatness as our own George Washington. 'First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen,' is a eulogy, simple but expressive, which can be spoken of him as it can be spoken of no other man, for his whole life was an embodiment of the principles of the great Declaration of Independence. Now, the examples of the lives of great men have an abiding influence on the lives of subsequent generations, and when all the details of the life of any great man are edifying it becomes our duty to keep the memory of that life perpetually green among us so that as citizens we may be influenced by it.

"As a Nation we have not forgotten Washington. We have enshrined his name forever in the great, growing, and beautiful city which is the Capital of our country and the seat of our National Government. But the very best way of all to give him the honor he deserves is for each of us individually to model our activities as citizens upon his.

"Before we had rounded out the first century of our history as a Nation we were plunged into that dreadful catastrophe, the Civil War, which threatened national disruption. Here again, in the time of pressing need, a great man stood revealed—a man who was the genuine product of democracy, a man tender of heart and sympathetic without weakness, who guided the Nation through the dark days of peril with such success that 'no star from our flag was lost' and the principle of national unity was established forever. I believe, ladies and gentlemen, that Abraham Lincoln will live in the history of our Nation and of the world as one of the greatest of men, and his speech at Gettysburg will remain as a classic in the English language—a simple, short, but ringing restatement of the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

"And now, after 138 years, how do we stand to-day in the light of the words of that declaration?

"To-day, ladies and gentlemen, more than ever before do we hold the essential equality of men before the law; to-day more than ever before do we recognize that certain inalienable rights belong alike to the highest and the lowest citizens of the land; to-day more than ever before it is a part of our gospel and of our practice that nothing can be more sacred than the life, liberty, and happiness of the people as a whole; and to-day more than ever before is the truth being driven home in all corners of the world that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

"Embodied for the first time in its distinct modern form in our Government of the United States, this idea has gone clear around the world, stirring up the oppressed everywhere to demand an audible voice in the affairs of government; the actual establishment of a Republic among the 400,000,000 inhabitants of China being the very latest manifestation of its influence.

"We have had grave problems to face during our short history as a Nation, and in these, our own days, they developed to such an acute degree that we seemed really on the verge of some catastrophe. Indeed, it did look for a time as if we had slipped back to conditions resembling those against which the Declaration of Independence was a protest. The rumblings of dissatisfaction were becoming more and more widespread in the land, when behold here again in our hour of national need a leader appeared whose true greatness grows more evident to the Nation every day. More, perhaps, than anyone ever before, he has stirred up the conscience of the people, pointed out clearly to them the real dangers which threatened the country, and roused them to a sense of their own responsibility for the very existence of those dangers. His utterances have brought us back to sane, sound common sense, and no man with the red blood of an American citizen in his veins can listen to that voice and yet stand idly by and tolerate any going back to the un-American conditions of the immediate past. For my own self, ladies and gentlemen, I cherish daily stronger sentiments of gratitude toward those of my fellow citizens who by their confidence in me conferred on me the distinguished honor of serving in Congress under a leader who has raised statesmanship to such a high level and who has made us all realize that we are in Washington for the sole purpose of laboring for the best interests of the people, and that in doing this our own interests and personal conveniences are to be considered as of secondary importance. You yourselves, from your knowledge of current events, are fully aware that President Wilson is the very first to set the example of self-sacrifice in this matter for the sake of working out without delay the much-needed reforms to which our party had pledged itself.

"We have grown used to the ways of the political quacks and the newspaper editors who, perhaps, have other interests to serve than purely patriotic ones. We can afford to watch with some amusement while they hurl at our distinguished President their darts of criticism; and whatever our political creed may be we can not help but admire the strength and calmness with which he goes on his appointed way, impervious alike to applause as to clamor and ridicule, determined at any cost to carry out his purpose of making America a good place to be in for all. Great men have occupied the presidential chair, but I believe none of them has realized more fully in himself or lived more completely up to the obligations of American citizenship than our present distinguished President; and I believe, further, that none has been to any more complete extent a President of the people and for the people.

"His Mexican policy has been exposed to almost constant ridicule; even Members of Congress stamp their feet in indignation and hurl forth the hot shot of denunciation against the Mexican policy of the administration, but I am among those who believe Woodrow Wilson is right; that his 'watchful waiting' policy will eventually win and that in the end a crowning victory will be marked to his credit, and I thank God that he has the courage and the patience in the teeth of bitter criticism to withhold intervention with arms in that troubled country. We are too far removed from the terrible days of the Civil War to realize to any great extent the horrors of that war or the curse of war in any shape or form, but it is providential that we have a man at the helm who realizes it and who is determined to save you from it if that can possibly be done without compromising the Nation's prestige or sacrificing her honor.

"Ah, gentlemen, when I think of the millions of our loyal, patriotic, and peace-loving American citizens, who are just about to begin to reap the benefits of improved conditions in this country, and then look forward into a future which would follow for them close upon the heels of war, I hope and pray with all the powers of my heart and soul that the great God of peace will strengthen the hand of Woodrow Wilson by enabling him to work out the solution of this problem by peaceful means without dragging our people through the deeps of the hell of war; for if he can succeed in doing this with honor, exercising the patience of conscious strength, President Wilson will have placed our country in an enviable position among the nations of the earth, will have given a new and a powerful impulse to the cause of universal peace, will have enshrined himself in the hearts of the American people, and 'generations yet to come will call him blessed,' while the calamity howlings and criticisms, denunciations, and jingoisms of the present time will have sunk into the insignificance of the chattering of magpies."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. PAR. 1. The Joint Committee on Printing shall have power to adopt and employ such measures as in its discretion may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in the execution of the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I do not now recall whether this is substantially the provision of the existing law or whether this is a new authority to be conferred on the Joint Committee on Printing. It seems to me a very broad authority to give to any committee "to adopt and employ such measures as in its discretion may be deemed necessary to remedy" almost anything. They could override, under the terms of this section, any provision of the law. This provision is not a provision that they may adopt and employ such measures as are not inconsistent with the terms of this act, but they may adopt and employ such measures as in its discretion may be deemed necessary. In other words, the fiat of the Joint Committee on Printing can do anything, on the ground that they give—and it is wholly within their power and discretion—that will "remedy any neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in the execution of the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications."

The Joint Committee on Printing, as I am informed and believe, is of the opinion that there is a great waste in the distribution of Government publications; that Members of Congress have more publications to distribute than they ought to have; that a large share of the publications which are distributed by Members of Congress go into the wastebasket. Having that opinion, under the terms of paragraph 1 of section 2 the Joint Committee on Printing may reduce the number to be issued, although the law provides otherwise, and may direct the suspension of any distribution, and do anything else that it wants to do.

Of course, the present Joint Committee on Printing, with the assistance of the able gentleman from Indiana, in charge of the bill, would not do anything that was improper; but you can not always tell who may be on the Committee on Printing in the course of time.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BARNHART. The only change in this paragraph, Mr. Chairman, from existing law is the addition of the words "duplication and waste." The law has never been abused by any Joint Printing Committee, and probably never will be. The fact of the matter is the Printing Committee is largely subject to the will of the House, and it is the same with the Senate Committee on Printing, which is largely subject to the will of the Senate. But the importance of this feature of the bill consists in the fact that many departments of the Government are continually indulging in duplication of publications. I might show numerous instances of that duplication, but I will use only a few. For instance, we have the "Sanitary survey of the schools of Orange County, Va." That is published by the United States Bureau of Education. We have a publication practically the same, by the United States Public Health Service, on rural schools, "Sanitary survey of schools in Bartholomew County, Ind.," probably made by the same individual. In the Department of Commerce we have issued a publication called "Canned salmon cheaper than meat, and why." Then we have an extract from the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture on supplementing our meat supply with fish—canned salmon. We have the United States Department of Agriculture issuing Bulletin No. 118, entitled "The school garden." The Bureau of Education publishes practically a duplicate of this and calls it "Cultivating the school grounds of Wake County, N. C." The Department of Agriculture issues a bulletin entitled "How to prevent typhoid fever." The Public Health Service issues a bulletin entitled "Causation and prevention of typhoid fever." Here again we have the United States Department of Public Health issuing a document entitled "Sanitary survey of schools in Bartholomew County, Ind."

Here are three departments issuing practically the same publications. Nobody is especially responsible for this duplication of work; but the committee believes that the law as it stands is working well, and this additional strengthening by the insertion of these words will enable the committee to designate some competent authority or compel the heads of the departments to submit their wants in the matter of publication of public documents to some authoritative head, at least to some authority whereby there may be a compilation which will prevent the possibility of each and every department publishing whatever they choose.

Further, Mr. Chairman, some time ago the Public Health Service printed a bulletin on "The care of the baby." The Census Bureau might have published that if it had the statistics or the suggestions. I understand the Childrens' Bureau asked for an appropriation to publish practically a duplication of this work. This would surely be a waste, because each of these departments doubtless will ask in its estimates for a sufficient number to supply the demand in that respect and too many would be published by the duplication.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this section may be allowed to stand as it is. It is only a slight change from the original. It will give the committee the authority, as is augmented further on in the bill, to prevent the possibility of these duplications, which do amount to a great waste.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken if he thinks that this provision would give the Joint Committee on Printing any practical jurisdiction over the question whether the Public Health Service should publish a document and the Children's Bureau should publish precisely the same thing. The Joint Committee on Printing will not know anything about it until after it is published. They do not publish unlimited numbers. They have a very limited quota, which they live up to; and so far as I am concerned, if the Public Health Service and the Labor Bureau shall publish advice, each of them, as to how to avoid typhoid fever, I am in favor of having it published by them and 40 other bureaus of the Government and put into the hands of the people. But, as I say, they publish very limited numbers.

Now, the gentleman is again slightly in error as to what this paragraph does. It has two additions from the existing law. The existing law gives to the Joint Committee on Printing power to adopt any measures necessary to remedy any neglect or delay in the printing and binding of documents or in the public printing and binding. That is to give them the power to remedy neglect and delay only as to public printing and binding. But this paragraph adds to their power the subject of duplication or waste and adds also "and the distribution of Government publications." Under the terms of the existing law the Joint Committee on Printing has no power to cut down the quota of Members of Congress of publications where the number is fixed by the law.

But under the terms of this paragraph the Joint Committee on Printing, if in their discretion they think it will be a waste to distribute public documents, have the authority to cease to give them to Members of Congress for distribution, and knowing the sentiment of many members of the Joint Committee on Printing in the past that Members ought not to have a large share of the documents which they obtain, I doubt the propriety or the desirability of submitting even to so amiable and excellent and able a gentleman as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] the question whether Members of Congress shall have these public documents which they are now authorized to distribute, or whether my friend from Indiana shall cut us out.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Printing have found that there is a great waste in public printing, but that is not because Members of Congress are getting more documents than they are entitled to, but because documents are being printed that the Members of Congress do not draw out, because they have no use for them. For instance, we are printing at great expense not only carloads but a trainload of costly documents every year that are going absolutely to waste, being sold as old junk, and the object of this bill and of the Committee on Printing is not to give Members of Congress fewer documents, but to give them the documents they want and that their constituents have use for, and to prevent the assignment to them of documents they have no use for. For instance, there is placed to my credit in the folding room every now and then a report on spirit leveling in California. That document is of absolutely no use to any person in my district, and we propose to save money by not publishing documents that are of no use to the Members, and to give the Members the advantage of taking in their stead documents that are needed in their districts.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, is not the abuse to which the gentleman refers taken care of in a subsequent section of this bill?

Mr. TAVENNER. Yes; but that is the general thought all the way through the bill. Now, as to this particular paragraph, we find, for instance, in the Agricultural Yearbook every year the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture. That report is being printed in four or five different forms. It does not add to the attractiveness of the Agricultural Yearbook, but, on the contrary, detracts from it. The Joint Committee on Printing would like to have the authority to prevent this duplication and to take out of the Agricultural Yearbook that dry, long report which takes up one-third of the book. Those who desire the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture can get it as such. This simply gives the committee the authority to cut out of that Agricultural Yearbook the duplication of the annual report of the Secretary, so as to make the book more attractive and valuable to the farmer, and to save the Government a large sum of money annually.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section is exhausted.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I move to strike out the last three words. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in opposing this section. It seems to me that in its present form it confers broad legislative powers on this Joint Committee on Printing, powers that the joint committee ought not to possess. It is true that the committee is a most excellent one. I have the highest regard for the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Printing, and believe much that he said concerning the necessity for economy has been well said, but I think no committee of this House ought to possess the broad legislative powers that this section would confer.

It is suggested that the Joint Committee on Printing might curtail the departments in the issuance of documents. I would not like to see the committee clothed with such power that it could clash directly with one of the executive departments of this Government. I would prefer that the Committee on Appropriations should have the right, as it now has, to supervise the estimates that come in, and recommend to this House the appropriations that are to be made, out of which come the expenditures for printing the documents issued by the departments. Why should this Joint Committee on Printing or the House Committee on Printing have broader, greater legislative powers than any other committee of this House is possessed of? Every other committee of this House is compelled to come here and submit to the action of the House. Every other committee of the House must come here to have its reports confirmed or rejected. But now it is proposed by this section that this Joint Committee on Printing shall be vested with such legislative powers as will permit them to act without regard to what the majority of this House may desire.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman from New York understand how the Joint Committee on Printing is created and what its duties are under the law?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have some idea, of course.

Mr. BARNHART. I will be glad to have the gentleman state how the joint committee is created and what its duties are under the law.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not know that it makes much difference how it is created.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, but it does.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Or what its duties are under the law. I do know that it is a committee of the Congress. I do know that it is composed of Members of the Senate and House, and know that Congress should be supreme in the exercise of its right and discretion to regulate the appropriations for the departments. I also know that this section is so broadly drawn that the time will come when the Joint Committee on Printing may clash with executive departments of the Government and when documents required for the use of Members of the House may not be furnished because the Joint Committee on Printing think differently from the departments, either as to the necessity of printing them at all or as to the number required for distribution.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my friend from New York if he is content to leave this matter in the hands of the Committee on Printing? I have heard my friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] on many occasions say that he regards this committee as one of the best and most efficient of the working committees in the House.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have said that before.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes; and repeated it; and is it not fair now to leave that committee some discretionary power?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. We are legislating not only for this Congress but for future time; and, while I repeat that I have the highest regard and the greatest respect for this Joint Committee on Printing, the time may come when this section may produce the effect to which I have before alluded, especially if there be a change in the personnel of the committee.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will my friend yield for a further question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. There is absolutely no difference of opinion between the gentleman from New York and myself. Both of us are agreed on that subject. Both of us realize that this committee has done its best in the preparation of this measure, and only this morning——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from New York ought to be allowed to speak for 35 minutes. He has not had much opportunity to address the House lately. I think he should be allowed to speak until he completes his remarks. He has been a most valuable Member of this body.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may continue for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, I wish to amend that request and ask that the gentleman from New York may be allowed to address the House until he finishes, on account of the lack of opportunity that he has had to address the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks that the gentleman from New York may proceed to the conclusion of his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object.

Mr KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on this matter for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, when my good friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] interrupted, I was about to ask my friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] if in view of the repeated declarations that he has made—and, I think, conservatively and wisely made—that the Printing Committee, so ably presided over by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], has not only done its work well but has done it efficiently, intelligently, and ably; that in a matter requiring discretion of the committee, instead of being criticized for bringing in this section of the bill, covering so completely the matter, that it should be complimented and not criticized

I now say to the gentleman from Indiana that I compliment him and the members of his committee on this matter, and I hope this afternoon when I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the measure that I have introduced and referred to his committee—namely, the printing of the memorial exercises on the Barry Monument—they will use that wide and wise discretion that they have always used and will allow me to have this bill taken up after his measure is disposed of. I have no desire at this time to put the gentleman from Indiana on record in regard to the measure; but after it is read to the House and explained intelligently, as I do everything [laughter and applause], I am sure that no Member on this side of the House, and certainly none of my good friends on the other side, will interfere with a measure that is for the public good.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes in an explanation of some of the abuses that have crept in and which were the cause of drafting this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, section 2, paragraph 1, is really more fully set out on page 122 of the bill in section 81, but I wish especially to call attention of the House at this particular time to some suggestions of my friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] because it will be necessary sooner or later that you understand some of the things that have been happening in years past which certainly necessitate the importance of there being some guide and staying hand over the Public Printing Office with which Congress has very largely to do.

The Government Printing Office is the servant of the Congress. It is really ours to have and to hold. It does, most of the time, congressional printing, and we ought to have the right, and always have had for a half century, to govern and control the Government printing.

The fact of the matter is that about the year 1905 some very grave abuses were discovered in the Government Printing Office, and a commission was appointed to make investigation. When that commission commenced the investigation the resignations and reappointments in the Government Printing Office head were so rapid that we had four different Government Printers in one year. Now I will tell you why. If you look into the report you will find, for instance, that during the four and a half years prior to the joint committee's beginning of the investigation Public Printers had expended a total of $2,303,703.30 for machinery and improvement of the printing plant. Of this sum $1,621,423.15 was expended for machinery alone, which the Public Printer purchased without being accountable to any one.

This expenditure for machinery was occasioned partly for the installation of typesetting machines. The commission discovered that in the purchase of these machines employees of the Government had relatives who owned stock in the companies from which machines were purchased, and the Public Printer bought typesetting machines to such an extent that even to this day there are some 50 machines in the Government Printing Office, at an original expense to the Government of $50,000, that have scarcely been used and are now so obsolete that they never will be used.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. REED. Was that under the present administration?

Mr. BARNHART. No. I may say that since about the year 1908 or 1910, since the Joint Committee on Printing became actively engaged in this investigation, the Government Printing Office has been administered quite economically, so far as the Printing Office itself is concerned; but the same law that enabled the former Government Printers, either mistakenly or intentionally, to indulge in this extravagance is on the statute book to-day, and it is that law that this bill seeks to correct.

Another Public Printer decided to change the furniture in the composing room. That is where the type is set. Any newspaper man will admit that it is a workshop. That composing room had substantial white-oak furniture, and the Government Printer, on his own volition, not accountable to anybody, threw the oak furniture away and purchased mahogany, brass-finish furniture instead at an expense of $20,000 to the Government. And there are many more items of extravagance like that. Another Public Printer installed what he called an auditing system. He did it of his own volition; he was not accountable to anybody, but he spent on that auditing system $138,110 in less than two years; and when it was discovered that his auditing system was of no account, the Government Printer resigned and the auditing system was thrown out, with a loss to the Government of something like $140,000 on the scheme.

Had the joint committee or some other board of overseers been authorized to exercise any control over the Government Printer, or had he been required to report to any committee or board of directors, these extravagances would not have been indulged in. Gentlemen of the committee, this joint committee is nothing more than a board of directors for the Government Printing Office.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes, sir; briefly.

Mr. HOWARD. In the last clause of section 2 I notice that it gives the right to the Joint Committee on Printing of being practically a board of censorship of our public documents.

Mr. BARNHART. In the last clause of paragraph 1?

Mr. HOWARD. Paragraph 1, on page 2, section 2. Is it the intention of the Joint Committee on Printing to pass on Government publications in the sense of a censorship, to see whether or not there is a duplication? For instance, take the poultry industry. A public bulletin on the poultry industry in the North has been issued, and there is a public bulletin on the poultry industry in the South. There are two separate conditions under which poultry is raised. Would the gentleman say that because a bulletin has been published on poultry conditions in the North you could not publish another one on poultry conditions in the South?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has asked me that question, and I thank him for it. It is one of the important features of the bill. If the gentleman had read the bill more thoroughly, he would have discovered that further on the bill provides that each department of the Government must each year make a report of its publications. It will then be the duty of the joint committee, or of its clerk, to look through these reports and see if there are any duplications, and suggest to these departments from time to time the duplications that have been made. Thus they will understand that they must report to somebody what is published, and it is probable that thereafter when one department presumes to assume the prerogative of another it will first make inquiry. For instance, the Children's Bureau may undertake to publish a bulletin on the public health. Before doing so I take it that that bureau would, if this provision be enacted, call up the other department and see if that department has a publication of similar nature. The Joint Committee on Printing, under the provisions of the bill as it has been drawn, is nothing more than the board of directors or trustees which we have in every bank in the United States, in every corporation, in every county organization where you have a county council, and in every township corporation where estimates of executive officials must be made to boards of investigation for approval. The gentleman from New York, in his suggestion that this committee had undertaken to legislate, is wrong. It does not undertake to do anything of the kind. It simply undertakes to act in the capacity of insisting that the Government departments and the Government Printer must have some head to which all these matters can be referred and adjusted.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I have discovered, according to your statements, that there has been considerable waste of money, or, to put it mildly, a great extravagance in the Government Printing Office under former administrations. Will the gentleman inform us how the Printer secured this money at the time, and from whom?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the money is appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations for the Government Printing Office.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the Committee on Appropriations look into these matters pretty carefully?

Mr. BARNHART. I might say that sometimes it does and sometimes it does not. For instance, within the not very distant past, as I said to the gentleman's colleague in the discussion the other day, the House, with approval of the Appropriations Committee, increased wages of certain Printing Office employees over others of similar union wage scales, to the dissatisfaction of the latter, as would be the result from a standpoint of fairness. The wages of this particular class of men were increased and many others doing a class of work for which like wages are paid all over the country did not get the increase. We believe that it is important that some committee of competent authority, or some legislative enactment, shall be provided that would relieve the Committee on Appropriations from haphazard wage-scale making in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. GOULDEN. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly and am in accord with the bill; but as I understood the gentleman, he stated that there was a yearly loss of some $50,000 on some machinery which was standing idle in the Government Printing Office. To what does the gentleman allude?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no; not yearly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GOULDEN. If there is any explanation of that, I would like to have it, as this is an interesting matter.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. The question that I desire to ask my friend from Indiana is this: This gives wider scope of authority to the Joint Committee on Printing over the administration of the Government Printing Office. The gentleman spoke about these men that had their wages increased. Does it not necessarily follow that if this authority is given to the Joint Committee on Printing it will give them practically the power, if they so desire to use it, to act as a censor of who will get the promotions in the Public Printing Office? In fact, would it not be the "whole cheese" down there?

Mr. BARNHART. Far from it. On the other hand, the bill means the very reverse. The bill gives no authority to the Joint Committee on Printing to do anything of the sort. It fixes a scale of wages that at this time seems to be proper, and that is all it does, and it asks for Congress to pass upon that just the same as it would pass on it if any other committee brought it to the floor of the House.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that I must apologize to my good friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE]. In reading this paragraph more closely I find that his contention is absolutely correct, and that my statement was wrong, and I want to correct whatever impression I made with regard to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he or the Public Printer is better qualified to make the rate of wages for the men who are employed in the Government Printing Office. The present Public Printer has been a practical workman employed on the Hudson Observer in the city of Hoboken——

Mr. BARNHART. In what capacity?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. As foreman. He started in as call boy, and by perseverance, hard work, industry, sobriety, and intelligence he worked himself up until he became foreman of that magnificent plant, and if there is any man in America who is capable of saying what rate of wages shall be paid not only to the pressmen, not only to the feeders, but to every man or woman in the Printing Office, it is that good son of Hudson County, Hon. Cornelius Ford, and I hope that the gentleman from Indiana, using that wise discretion on which I complimented him this afternoon, will allow the House to speedily vote to strike out of the bill this paragraph which mars it, and in sitting down I want to say again to my good friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] that his contention was right, and that in answering his contention I was wrong.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the interrogatory. I assume that the gentleman from New Jersey has had some sudden information from the outside. I am sorry that this matter comes to a point where it is necessary for me to make some response now that I did not care to indulge in. The present Public Printer has made probably the best showing in economy of any Public Printer the Government has had for many years. He is an industrious, capable man, but he has urged a certain scale of wages in which he reached the climax by asking that his own wages be increased $2,500 a year.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit me to say——

Mr. BARNHART. I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARNHART. No; I will not yield, but——

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. That is not so, Mr. Chairman; the gentleman in wrong about that. He asked $500 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is out of order.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not care to have my authority questioned, and if the gentleman will look at the hearings——

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. That is where it is taken from——

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman will find he asked for $7,500 a year, and we give him an increase of $500, making $8,000. He has $5.500 a year now.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. He asked for how much?

Mr. BARNHART. Seventy-five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. If he is receiving $5,500, that is only an increase of $2,000.

Mr. BARNHART. If I said $2,500, I meant $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I might say the committee has appreciated the fact that there is going to be opposition to this bill from one given source, and that is from the Government Printing Office. All Government Printers who have preceded insist that they ought to have the largest authority possible; that they ought to have full control. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that the Government Printer is the only head in any department of the Government who has an expenditure of more than $2,000,000 in his own care and keeping. We believe it is too much authority, notwithstanding the fact I believe we do have now one of the best Government Printers the Government has ever had. As I said before, I believe he is honest, competent, energetic, and is making a wonderful showing in economy; but that is not any reason why some other Government Printer in time to come might not make the mistakes that have been made heretofore. At the present time the joint committee is proceeding in harmony with the Government Printer in the matter of purchases, and so forth; but the law as proposed will fix it so that it will be necessary for any succeeding Printer, whoever he may be, whether competent or incompetent, to submit his proposed proceedings in purchases to some authority which I have previously alluded to as being virtually a board of directors.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. This has occurred to me, and I would like to be enlightened by the distinguished chairman of the committee. Suppose between the final adojurnment of Congress and the convening of the next Congress one of the departments of the Government sees fit on the request of Senators or Representatives or some citizens to issue a particular document. Now, how will the Joint Committee on Printing, under the section of this bill as now framed, act? The Joint Committee on Printing will have no meeting in all probability. They will be away from Washington, just like any other Representatives and Senators will be. Now, then will come the clash and there will be no way of regulating or settling it. The document may be required. It may be of the highest importance that the document shall be reprinted and issued without much delay. There may be an honest difference of opinion between the department and the chairman of the committee, if indeed the chairman be communicated with. Now, how is that to be settled during the period to which I have referred, namely, between the final adjournment of Congress and the convening of the next Congress?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I tried to explain that to the gentleman from New York before, and I take it that he was not listening to what I said, because I explained it in this way: This provision of the bill, or this section, does not fix any authority for the joint committee to say what shall or shall not be done, but the bill further on provides there shall be a report of the heads of departments each year on publications issued, and that the Joint Committee on Printing will take these reports and ascertain whether there has been duplication.

And if there has been to such an extent that it has been wasteful, of course the joint committee will report to some higher authority and try to arrange that the same thing will not occur again. It is suggestive rather than directory.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand all that; but I am afraid I have not made myself clear to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]. I am referring to the action of the department ordering the reprinting of some document, some bulletin, or some other paper, usually issued from the department. Now, suppose the question arises as to whether or not that is an undue duplication, or whether or not it constitutes waste, as has already been suggested by the gentleman from Indiana. How is it to be settled? The committee will not be here in Washington to act on the matter or settle the matter in difference.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. That is merely presumption, Mr. Chairman. For several years there has been no adjournment of Congress; and since the Congress in its wisdom has increased its membership to nearly 440 Members, the probability is that we shall be here year after year practically all the time.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The gentleman knows we will have no special session next fall.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understood the gentleman a while ago to say that the Public Printer has asked for an increase of $2,000 a year in his salary?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He now receives $5,500?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I thought you were going to make some statement as to how much increase he recommended for the employees. Do you know whether he recommended that much or how much he recommended?

Mr. BARNHART. I think he recommended a total for employees of about $87,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. About what percentage would that be of increase for employees?

Mr. BARNHART. I can not tell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] has again expired.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee states the Public Printer asked for an increase in his salary from $5,500 a year to $7,500 a year, and I find from a copy of the Senate hearings, which I have here, that he did ask for such increase. Whatever little success I have had in life, Mr. Chairman, has come from the fact that I am mostly willing to believe the other fellow.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I always yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman referred to is a very high class man and he is worth all that he asks, is he not?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Of course the gentleman from Illinois states exactly the truth. Any first-class printer who comes to Washington from the county that I have the honor to represent in part and takes upon himself the manifold duties incumbent upon the office of Public Printer of the United States, and who asks the modest sum of $7,500 is, in my judgment to be complimented, and if I were a member of the Printing Committee I would do myself the honor, and I would do the man at the head of that magnificent plant the justice, to vote that his salary be increased to $7,500. [Applause.]

But aside from that, Mr. Chairman, the all-important fact that confronts this House this afternoon relating to this section is that the present Public Printer of the United States, despite the fact that we have been in session a greater number of days than any other session of Congress since the establishment of the Government Printing Office, has reduced the running expenses of that plant in round figures $52,000 a year. And I want to submit to the membership of this House——

Mr. TAVENNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Not now. I will be glad to do so before I finish if I have the time.

I want to submit to the membership of this House that any man who has intelligence enough, who has industry enough, to save this Government in one year $1,000 for every week that his plant has been running, ought to have an increase in his salary of $2,000 a year, and we ought to vote for it as a unit, even though it amounts to 36 per cent, as my mathematical friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] indicated.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Not at the present time.

Now, there is a great deal of misunderstanding regarding the gentleman who occupies the position of Public Printer at this time. I remember that some of our newspapers criticized him during the holiday season because, forsooth, he gave Democrats a place or two in his office. Now, I want to ask my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is square on every proposition that comes before this House, what he would do if he was a Public Printer and had opportunity to place a Republican? He would do as my friend Ford did. If I were Public Printer what would I do if a Democratic Member asked me to try to take care of a friend? Why, I would take care of him. And if a Republican came down that I liked, I would try to help him, too.

Mr. BUTLER. Would you take care of mine?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes; I would—always.

Mr. Chairman, another thing I want to draw the attention of the House to this afternoon is this: That in these days of economical administration of affairs there is only one way to arrive at economy in the public service, and that is to have men at the head of your institutions in whom you can repose every confidence.

I am not going to vote here this afternoon, simply because in the future some man of a different type than Ford may be Public Printer, and he may say he wants some increases that are not warranted by facts. Let the future take care of itself. Let us say to the people of this Nation that this House, both Democratic and Republican, reposes the utmost confidence in that valiant little man who has wrought a saving of $1,000 a week despite the 25 per cent increase in the work of his office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know if the gentleman will yield part of that time to answer a question?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. If you will get five minutes for me, I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, as this section we are now on has not anything to do with the question of wages, I am going to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph close at the end of five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Surely; of course I will. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of——

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Surely.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman a moment ago, referring to his "mathematical friend from Maryland," insinuated that I opposed the increase of salary because it was 36 per cent.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The gentleman is wrong in his inference. I know that the gentleman from Maryland is intelligent, and I know that he agrees with me in this contention, as every other intelligent gentleman does.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I may admit that I am intelligent, but what I wanted to ask was this, whether the Public Printer recommended 36 per cent increase for the employees, because I am in favor of the employees receiving the same proportionate increase as the Public Printer receives. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, that is a fair question, and I want to say to my good friend from Maryland that the Public Printer of the United States carries in his pocket a union card, and every man that is in the employ of the Public Printer of the United States—or in the employ of the United States Government under him—is receiving union wages or better, and that is satisfactory to the men and also satisfactory to the membership of this body as a whole.

Fifty-two thousand dollars in salaries was saved, and not a single man over there lost his position; I mean of the workmen; some sinecures were done away with. The increase in the output has been during the past year 25 per cent; and I call this to the attention of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], that notwithstanding that increase—a tremendous increase, one-fourth more than they ever did before in the history of the Public Printer's office—notwithstanding this increase, Mr. Ford has been able to reduce the running expenses of his plant $1,000 each week. I say to the gentleman from Indiana that if I were in his place, with the facts before me as I have presented them to him this afternoon, I would rise in my place and ask that a vote be had on this paragraph, and that it be stricken from the bill. Otherwise, in my judgment, the measure is all right.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about. There is not anything in this paragraph pertaining to the wages of the Public Printer.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Of course, I am not talking about the wages of the Public Printer, and the gentleman knows it. I settled that long ago. I am talking about the paragraph in question; and in case the gentleman does not know what paragraph we have in hand, I want to read it to him. It provides:

> The Joint Committee on Printing shall have power to adopt and employ such measures as in its discretion may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in the execution of the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

Why, the insinuation there is as clear as the noonday sun, and I resent it on behalf of my worthy constituent, a young man who has always helped me in every fight I was ever in. [Applause and laughter.] And I say to the membership of this House this afternoon that whenever the young man in question is in a fight I hope to be here present on the floor of the House and take up the fight in behalf of him as manfully, if not as intelligently, as he has taken it up in my behalf; and I hope when this question is presented to this body this afternoon that without exception the membership of it will vote to strike this iniquitous clause from the measure.

Mr. Chairman, how much of my time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me very unfortunate that at the beginning of the consideration of this bill so much time should be wasted by gentlemen who apparently have not read the bill. We have just been talking about something which the section under discussion does not touch in any way. I want to say for the committee that the committee has the most kindly feeling for the Public Printer. In fact, we take some credit for helping him save that $52,000 a year, because in the past year we have been working in harmony with the Public Printer.

Later on in this bill the salaries of the different officials, as well as employees, will be fixed. The committee does not have the fixing of the salaries to be paid. You will find that every printer is receiving the full union scale, and probably more, and the rate of pay will be fixed in the bill, and can not be changed again except by Congress. We have taken the position that too much power should not be given to one man, and we have fixed the amount of compensation in this bill.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield right there?

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. In a moment. In another section the amount of salary to be paid to the Public Printer is fixed, and we have raised the salary from $5,500 to $6,000. If my friend from New Jersey thinks that is not enough, later on he will have an opportunity to offer an amendment to make it

$7,500 or any amount he thinks fit. The gentleman should get out of his mind any idea that we are making an attack upon the present Public Printer.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I know that my friend from Pennsylvania is not making any attack upon the Public Printer, and I listened with great pleasure to the words of praise that fell from his lips regarding Mr. Ford this afternoon. But he is taking the argument advanced by the chairman of the committee, who states that he does not want too much power conferred upon the Public Printer. This is taking away powers now possessed by the man that they regard as the most intelligent Public Printer that the office has ever had, and I submit to the House that since this is not conferring any greater power upon the Public Printer, and it does deprive him of the powers that he now possesses, by virtue of which, despite the fact that the increase in the work has been 25 per cent, he has been able to reduce the running expenses of that magnificent plant $52,000 a year, or $1,000 for each week of the calendar year; therefore I hope this paragraph will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's remarks I will say, as has been stated before, that this particular section is practically the existing law.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. If it is, I submit that there is no need of repeating it here in the bill. What is the necessity, if it is the existing law?

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. We are revising and codifying the printing laws.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. If, as the gentleman says, they have the power now, what is the good of writing it into law? I am sure the gentleman agrees with me. I can tell from the way the gentleman is talking with regard to this measure that he agrees with me on it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understand from the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the salary of the Public Printer is increased by giving him $500 more, making his salary $6,000. Are the wages of the employees under the Public Printer increased in porportion to that?

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question I will say that some of the employees receive increases. The scale of wages named in this bill is based upon the figures secured from the Department of Labor, showing what printers doing the same kind of work in the different sections of the country receive. I would say to the gentleman that the printers in the Government Printing Office are receiving equally as much or more money than anyone else in the same line of work in any printing establishment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one-half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am not objecting to the increase in the pay of the Public Printer. I think he deserves it, and I think the employees under the Public Printer who work behind the linotype machines and in other places in that establishment ought also to receive a proportionate increase in their compensation. It is noticeable that the higher officials in the Government experience very much less difficulty in having their compensation adjusted to a point where the service rendered and the salary paid correspond than the ordinary employees. The latter are compelled to put forth almost heroic efforts if they desire a change from a salary basis established perhaps some 20 or 30 years ago. I am not criticizing the proposed increase in this instance, but what I do wish to call attention to is that we are in duty bound to treat the lesser employees with the same attention and consideration that we do the greater ones.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks for a division.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. No; I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 25.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 15 Members—not a sufficient number—seconding the demand.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Pending the count,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a number of gentlemen who have been counted once are now holding up their hands and asking to be counted again.

The CHAIRMAN. The point made by the gentleman from Illinois is well taken. If the Members will stand still for a few moments, the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven gentlemen present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15902, and finding itself without a quorum had caused the roll to be called, when 244 Members responded to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement of two minutes regarding the paragraph in question. Some of the Members in the meantime have come in.

Mr. BARNHART. I shall not object, Mr. Chairman, if I am permitted to follow for three minutes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I ask for three minutes also.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee found itself without a quorum the question was on an amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD], and that gentleman now asks that he be allowed to proceed for three minutes by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that tellers were ordered?

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers were not ordered for the lack of a quorum. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph in question will be found on page 2 of the bill H. R. 15902. In effect it takes from the Public Printer the powers which he now possesses and places them in the hands of a committee of this House. During the past year your Public Printer increased the output of that plant, which is under his immediate direction, 25 per cent. Notwithstanding that fact he reduced the running expenses of the Government Printing Office no less than $1,000 a week. The saving to the United States Government in the aggregate was $52,000 a year.

The chairman of the Committee on Printing, who should really precede me and I answer him, states that he desires this enacted into law in order to prevent a future Public Printer from committing any acts that he knows the present Public Printer would not be guilty of. I submit to you that this is an insinuation against a man who is now using his powers wisely, using good discretion with regard to the powers that have been conferred upon him, and by the use of those powers has been enabled to save to the people of this country $52,000 a year and to increase the output of that magnificent plant 25 per cent. We ought to say to him: "Go on, continue intelligently directing this governmental office, and every man of us, whether we are Democrats or whether we are Republicans, will stand by you."

I want to say to my friends on the Republican side that there will be a few friends on our side of the House who are going to vote against my proposition because the Public Printer would not fire out of office some men who are down there. He has given to the men on the Republican side of the House more places than any other man in the Government service.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, that part of the remarks by the gentleman from New Jersey relative to the work and merit of the present Public Printer I agree to, except, possibly, in this: That all of the saving of the $50,000 claimed by the gentleman from New Jersey may not have been effected by the Public Printer. The members of the Joint Committee on Printing have been acting in conjunction with the Public Printer, and it has aided in selecting stock and letting contracts for paper and machinery, and it claims some little part in the saving, whatever it may have been.

Another matter for your consideration is that this section is practically the reenactment of existing law. The Public Printer is not especially concerned in this; it is merely an effort to break down the bill because it seeks to strengthen, by the amendment of a law that already exists, supervisory control over the Government Printing Office by the House and the Senate. It is our Printing Office, and you have a right by selecting your membership of the joint committee to oversee this Printing Office, and you have a right to exercise some judgment as to what is going to be done and what not. This paragraph provides that the joint committee shall, in conjunction with the Public Printer, exercise the best judgment of the combined efforts of the two to provide for you such documents as you and your constituents will need and in distributing them in the most economical and efficient way possible.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I understood the gentleman to say that the committee shall, in connection with the Public Printer, do so-and-so. There is no such provision in the paragraph.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that this paragraph is further emphasized and amplified in section 81 of the bill.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Well, let us strike this out now.

Mr. BARNHART. I decline to yield to the gentleman; the gentleman has had his time. I want to say that this enactment is largely a reaffirmation of existing law. The committee believes that we ought to have some control over the printing in which you are all interested. It merely undertakes to establish the fact that we have a right in this House, through our Committee on Printing, to print such documents as we choose and to exercise control over Government printing so as to prevent possible scandals such as once arose and gave us four Public Printers in a single year because of purchases that were made, to the discredit of the Government officers involved.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that he was perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the present Public Printer had conducted his office.

Mr. BARNHART. I am; he has conducted it well, with the aid of the joint committee.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. What is the necessity of writing this into the law, and by inference saying that the man who has saved the Government this great sum of money and has increased the efficiency of the office——

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to have my time taken up by the gentleman from New Jersey, who has already had his full time. The paragraph insinuates nothing of the kind.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. If the gentleman will read the paragraph, he will see that it does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey to strike out section 2, paragraph 1.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey) there were 54 ayes and 59 noes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 66 ayes and 76 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. PAR. 2. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to inquire at any time into all matters pertaining to the public printing and binding and the distribution of publications for Congress, the various executive and judicial departments, independent offices, and establishments of the Government, to report to Congress from time to time any abuses in the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, and to recommend such remedial legislation as in its judgment may seem proper.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, at the beginning of the line, strike out the words "and judicial."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was unable to secure any time from the chairman of the committee in general debate, but I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter in connection with the distribution of Government documents which perhaps is well known to the older Members of the House, but which perhaps may not be known to those who have recently come into the body. On March 11, 1914, I introduced House resolution 435, requiring an investigation by the Committee on Printing of the manner in which the publication known as the Messages and Papers of the Presidents was being sold to the public. After introducing the resolution, I made inquiries to ascertain if the subject had ever been brought to the attention of any prior Congress and learned that it had been investigated during the year 1900 and that a full report thereon was made to the Senate, which report can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the proceedings of the Fifty-sixth Congress, page 5834. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems that, notwithstanding the investigation which was made by the Senate at that time, the public are still being deceived with reference to the sale of this Government publication.

I am perfectly aware of the fact that Congress, when the publication was authorized, did convey to the gentleman who arranged the matter for the publication the plates that were used in the publication, and that Congress has not since that time authorized any further printing of the sets at public expense. But I wish to advise the House that the company or individuals who are now representing themselves to be the owners of these plates and authorized to sell the sets are taking advantage of the fact that the publication was authorized by Congress originally. They are imposing upon the public and securing their patronage largely by the representations they are making that Members of Congress are in some way responsible for and are interested in its present sale and distribution.

In other words, agents are going into my district and into the districts of many Representatives, and are saying to prospective customers that they have secured their names from Members of Congress; that particular selection has been made of these names in each of the districts in order that this work of great national interest may be distributed among those who are particularly favored. I have in my hand letters which I have received from people living in Colorado, Maryland, Indiana, and in other States, complaining about the deception and imposition which have been practiced upon them by those who are at the present time endeavoring to sell this publication. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that it is possible to secure a set of the Messages in some of the secondhand book stores throughout the country at a price as low as three or five dollars per set. The superintendent of documents informs me that he has many sets for sale at eight or ten dollars a set. Notwithstanding this, contracts are being procured throughout the country calling for the delivery of these volumes for as high as $59.50 per set. The method pursued by the gentlemanly agent when he arrives in a city is to interview the prominent men, present the attractiveness of the volumes, and mention the fact that the Congressman from that district has selected a few influential persons to be the recipients of the publication, secure a small payment down, and then take notes or contracts from the purchasers for the balance. In many sections of the country there is evidence of this campaign of misrepresentation, and it is injurious to Members of Congress. People are complaining that the names of Congressmen are being used to facilitate the false and misleading sale of this publication, and I am satisfied from my investigation of the subject that there should be some general publicity given to the fact that this publication can be had at such a small price, and that Members of Congress have no connection whatever with the distribution or sale of the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to read a paragraph from a letter which I received from a gentleman in the State of Colorado, in which he says:

I was told how highly Congressmen value this work as a reference, and was even shown parts of a discussion where Congressmen had discussed the advisability of distributing this work free of charge in the interest of higher education, and was told that it was finally decided that each Congressman should be allowed to designate a certain number of persons in his district who should receive this work, but that the recipients should be allowed to pay the actual expenses of publishing and distribution.

Mr. Chairman, I think the recital that I have made demonstrates the necessity for close supervision on the part of a duly authorized and empowered committee of Congress of the work of distributing public documents, especially those that are of particular value. I believe that Congress was to blame for parting with the plates from which this publication was made, and without making any criticism whatever of the party who received the plates, I am inclined to think that it would have been much better for Congress to have made an appropriation to pay for the preparation of this valuable work, and thus have relieved itself of the imputation against it created throughout the country by the false and misleading statements that have been made by those who are directing and controlling its sale.

Mr. Chairman, in order that the membership of the House may have some knowledge of the course being followed by the agents of parties who are interested in the sale of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents I desire to insert the following letters in the RECORD:

BALTIMORE, March 14, 1914.

Representative SELDOMRIDGE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice by the Baltimore Evening News, under date of March 12, 1914, that you have introduced a resolution in Congress asking for an investigation of the private sales of the publication known as Messages and Papers of the Presidents.

I write this to congratulate you on taking this action and to say that I as a member of the bar of this city have many cases where suits have been entered by the Army and Navy Magazine, a crowd operating in the city of New York, but using, as far as I am advised and can understand, the name of the Government in the sale of these books. I can give you the detailed history of a half dozen cases in the city of Baltimore in regard to their sale. If you are interested and care to have the information I will send the same to you, as it does seem to me that it has been the use of the name of the Government that has enabled these gentlemen to sell these books.

Yours, truly,

JOHN L. G. LEE.

CRIPPLE CREEK, COLO., March 17, 1914.

Hon. H. H. SELDOMRIDGE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Recent press dispatches have it that you have introduced a resolution asking that the method of sale and distribution of a certain set of books entitled "Messages and Papers of the Presidents," published by the Army and Navy Magazine, of New York and Washington, be investigated. I realize that this resolution can not impair any contract which has been made, but it appears to me, since I am one of the many who purchased this set of books at $59, that there was some fraud practiced in making the sale.

When the salesman asked me to buy he said that my name had been given by some Congressman and that there were but 11 names in town. Since that time I have ascertained that some 20 sets of books were sold.

In view of the above it might establish sufficient fraud on the part of the Army and Navy Magazine to have the contract set aside. Awaiting any suggestions you might make, I am,

Yours, very truly,

H. C. DENNY.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., October 11, 1913.

Mr. H. H. SELDOMRIDGE,
Colorado Springs, Colo.

MY DEAR MR. SELDOMRIDGE: I did not find the statement regarding the publication of the Messages from the Presidents in 11 volumes that I spoke to you about. I only have the subscription blank which I first had made out and which I had canceled, as I told you and which I am inclosing herewith.

The agent's name was James B. Wooster, jr. He first reached me with the statement that the selected list of names in Colorado Springs as beneficiaries was suggested by some one or more of the Congressmen or Representatives in Washington, although he did not know who they were as the information came to him in a letter from the President of the Army and Navy Magazine Co. With this he had some circulars which contained the resolution of Congress granting to Col. Richardson the plates, type, vignettes, etc., from which all of the copies of the messages and papers had been printed for Congress, and granting this without consideration other than in recognition of his services in compiling these. He further told me that they were issuing 85,000 sets of these books, which at $59.50 would mean nearly $5,000,000, of which it is safe to say from a view of the books that 50 per cent is profit less the agents' commissions. It would appear that in some way this matter which has been compiled for the Government and probably at very great expense is being exploited for private ends. That part of the matter, while I consider it wrong, is of less importance to me than the fact that the agents who have been going around the country representing the publication as a Government publication and securing the attention of possible subscribers by the unauthorized method used by this Mr. Wooster, who came to see me. If he had represented himself as a book agent or bookseller he probably knew as did also the officers of the Army and Navy Magazine that he could not get the ear of the usual business man, and therefore they were fortified with the letters and statement of which I have told you representing the whole matter as emanating from Congress and the Government instead of from a private concern and exploiting the matter for private ends.

Yours,

E. C. VAN DIEST.

DENVER, COLO., March 14, 1914.

Representative SELDOMRIDGE, of Colorado,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Some time ago I was called upon by a representative of the Army and Navy Magazine, who described to me a political and economical history of the United States prepared for the special benefit of Congressmen for their enlightenment on the questions of State, at the expense of the Government.

I was told that this work contained valuable information on the science of government, besides giving a complete history of the United States, from the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers until the present time. I was told how highly Congressmen valued this work, as a reference, and was even shown parts of a discussion where Congressmen had discussed the advisability of distributing this work free in the interests of higher education, and was told that it was finally decided that each Congressman should be allowed to designate a certain number of persons in his district who should receive this work, but that the recipient should be allowed to pay the actual expenses of publishing and distribution.

I was told that my employer was designated by the Representative from this district to receive this great work, and as it happened that he was out of town, the salesman took the liberty of allowing me to subscribe.

Imagine my feelings when this work arrived and I found it to be the Presidents' Messages to Congress, bound in book form.

After examining the work, I notified the Army and Navy Magazine that I had very carefully repacked each volume and held them for shipping instructions.

They immediately notified me that at the time I subscribed and paid $8 in cash to the salesman, I had signed a note for $59.50 and that they proposed to collect it.

What do you advise? Shall I simply keep quiet and allow them to sue me or shall I consign the books to them charges collect and begin suit against them for the $8 which I paid before receiving books?

Thanking you very cordially in advance for your reply, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

J. J. LITTON.

WORCESTER, MASS, March 15, 1914.

Hon. HARRY H. SELDOMRIDGE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to notice that you have started an inquiry into the private sale of Messages and Papers of the Presidents.

That set of books is being exploited in this vicinity, and several cases of sales through misrepresentation have come to my attention, so that a few weeks ago I sent to our local papers a note of warning. I inclose a copy of it, with my best wishes for the success of your effort both to get at the facts and to bring it about that the mistake made by Congress in giving the plates of this public document to a private individual may not soon be repeated.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE H. HAYNES.

The following letter was printed in the Worcester Evening Post, of Worcester, Mass., in its issue of March 5 last:

SET OF BOOKS THAT HAVE SOME HISTORY—PROF. HAYNES TELLS OF "MESSAGES OF PRESIDENTS."

MARCH 4, 1914.

To the Editor of the Post.

SIR: At the present time eloquent agents are taking subscriptions in Massachusetts for a notable set of books. The Messages and Papers of the Presidents have an interesting history, with which the prospective buyer may do well to familiarize himself before being stampeded into signing the subscription blank.

July 27, 1894, Congress authorized the compilation of all the messages and papers of the Presidents, placing the work in the hands of the Joint Committee on Printing. That committee requested the Hon. James D. Richardson, then a Congressman from Tennessee, to make the compilation. He expended much time on this work, and later, at an expense of some $3,600, indexed the series.

Three editions of the "Messages," aggregating 36,000 sets of 10 volumes each, were "printed by the Government Printing Office and distributed free by Members and officers of the two Houses of Congress."

The printing act of 1895 made it illegal to copyright any Government publication. It is a question for acute lawyers to determine how—in the face of that prohibition—a copyright within three years did get issued to James D. Richardson. Formal congressional inquiry has been directed upon that question, with unsatisfactory results.

The sundry civil bill, which became a law June 4, 1897, contained this provision: "That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to make and deliver to James D. Richardson, the compiler of Messages and Papers of the Presidents, without cost to him, duplicate electrotype plates from which the compilation of Messages and Papers of the Presidents is published."

The incidents to which this unprecedented act gave rise are set forth in a special investigation by the Senate Committee on Printing (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 33, pp. 5834–5835, May 22, 1900). The committee declares that in making this grant to James D. Richardson Congress "made a mistake." If anything more than a gracious public acknowledgment of the value of his work was due to Mr. Richardson, it should have been paid in money, duly appropriated for the purpose.

The report states that soon after this grant a contract was entered into under which, for a royalty to James D. Richardson of 75 cents per set for all sets sold, a certain publisher obtained "the exclusive use of the plates." A few months later this publisher abandoned his former trade name and assumed for his new enterprise the name, "committee on distribution," and in booming his wares used many expressions "such as necessarily to mislead the public into the belief that the Government was in some way identified with the publication and sale of his books. * * * Persons addressed as prospective purchasers were told that the 'committee on distribution' had been 'appointed to distribute the work' and that Congress had 'granted the privilege of printing a limited edition' and that the 'distribution' was to be made by 'congressional districts' and that the 'number of sets' had been 'apportioned' in accordance with a 'ratio.'"

The report declared that Richardson's receipts from royalties on sales thus promoted, up to the period of the investigation, had amounted to $11,320.50. It concluded: "Congress has it in its own power to avoid a repetition of the false representations of which it has been the victim by not again placing Government plates at the disposition of private persons. The language of the statute forbidding the copyrighting of Government publications appears to the committee to be as strong as it can be made."

March 1, 1901, this set of books figured again in Senate debate when Senator GALLINGER advocated the printing of a new edition, 6,000 to be distributed by Senators and Representatives and 10,000 to be held by the superintendent of public documents and sold at the actual cost of publication. In urging the importance of this last provision he said: "Here are gentlemen going over the country imposing upon the people of this country by selling a public document for $35 that can be published for about $9 or $10, and they have brought themselves into such disrepute that a judge, Justice Childs, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, said the other day: 'The plain purpose of the person who originated this system of obtaining subscribers for these books was to defraud the public. Such a scheme, permeated with fraud from start to finish, should not be permitted by sanction of any court to succeed.'"

Senator GALLINGER continued: "I have a mass of documents here which show that a gigantic fraud is being perpetrated upon the people of this country."

Such are some of the salient points in the history of this work down to 1901. The writer had no difficulty in securing, gratis for the W. P. I. and for his own library, sets of this work from a Member of Congress at the very time when subscribers in this city were being induced to pay $35 and over for the sets put out by the "committee on distribution." That 10-volume set, covering the "Messages and papers of the Presidents" from Washington to McKinley, inclusive, is now on sale by the supecintendent of public documents—as he assured me February 12, 1914—at $9 a set.

In recent months "Messages and papers of the Presidents" have again come upon the scene in the hands of eloquent agents. It is now put out by the Army and Navy Magazine, but in none of its circulars or letterheads do the names of persons connected with it appear. Is the "committee on distribution" operating under a new name?

It should be distinctly noted for all that it is worth that there has now been added an eleventh volume, not a part of any Government publication, including the State papers of Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, and an "encyclopedic index" now makes cross-reference easily possible between these messages, etc., and those of the earlier Presidents. The prospective purchaser would do well to determine whether, aside from the inclusion of these most accessible papers of the last two administrations and the consequent changes in the index, any other modification whatever has been made in these sets of books.

A 50-page pamphlet is used to boom these books. It contains some 400 flattering comments, largely from former Congressmen. Not one of them now bears a date. It would be interesting to know how large a proportion of them appeared after the above-mentioned report was submitted in the Senate.

The prospective purchaser is again being assured that this rare and never-to-be-repeated opportunity comes to him because his name chances to be on the agent's list, there being but a limited number of sets assigned to each congressional district.

The minimum price is now about $50, and as much more as the purchaser wants to invest in fancy binding.

Now, before the prospective purchaser is stampeded into the patriotic act of signing a subscription blank for these books, he may do well to consider whether the addition of the State papers of Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, with a suitable index, increases by $40 the value of a public document which he can buy at any time for $9.

The earlier set is accessible in every public library of any size and literally in tens of thousands of private libraries. It can never be a "rarity," for 36,000 sets have been put out by the Public Printer, while—if the Senate report is accurate—15,000 more sets had been sold, subject to royalty, before 1901.

The 11 volumes make a stately procession on the purchaser's shelves. As Abraham Lincoln said, under similar circumstances, "This is a very good kind of a book for the man who wants this kind of a book."

GEORGE H. HAYNES,
Worcester Polytechnic Institute.

Prof. George H. Haynes, of the department of economics and political science in the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, does a real public service in his warning, elsewhere, against the subscription-book exploitation of what is, to the extent he explains, a governmental publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. No, Mr. Chairman; I oppose the motion of the gentleman, I do not think it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. Chairman, the fraud and deceit referred to by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] has been running for a great many years. I have not heard of it recently, although I should think 10 or 12 years ago they were having some of this in my district, and they may be yet, for all I know. The whole case is an illustration of the need that Congress ought to be very careful with what it possesses. Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, recently deceased, was the ranking Democrat on the Committee on Printing of the House and was the minority or Democratic leader of the House. He had a very high standing in the House when he was a Member of the House, and has since had a high standing in the country in the position that he occupied. He edited the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, I believe, in the main, because he was a member of the Committee on Printing, and had been for a considerable time the authority in the House on printing, and at the time even when he was on the minority side of the House Congress ordered the Messages and Papers of the President printed twice, as I recall it, for distribution. There was one distribution ordered after I became a Member of the House. There had been another distribution ordered before I became a Member of the House. Mr. Richardson had received no pay for editing those reports. I do not know how much work there was involved in the editing of the reports; I assume not very much work, so far as he was concerned, but some work and some responsibility, and in the closing days of one of the Congresses, the Fifty-fifth or Fifty-sixth, I think, Mr. Richardson suggested that having received no pay, and he did this privately, and the Government having finished its publication of the set, it might very properly present to him the plates, which were lying in the Government Printing Office, of no value to anyone except for the metal contained in them, so far as the Government was concerned, and in a spirit of generosity and fairness the House inserted a provision in one of the bills presenting those plates to Mr. Richardson.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I think the gentleman might have given a mistaken impression in the statement that the Government gave the plates to Mr. Richardson. There was a duplicate set of plates, and one was given over to him and the other is still kept in the possession of the Government, and the Government is now ready to print these documents as there may be demand for them. They are for sale at the document room at $10 per set.

Mr. MANN. I did not even know there were duplicate sets; that was not my understanding at the time. I do not deny, of course, the gentleman's authority.

Mr. BARNHART. That is my information.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is, we presented the plates in the Government Printing Office to Mr. Richardson. Maybe there were duplicate plates; very likely there may have been several sets of plates in printing so large an edition of that work. Shortly thereafter a company or association was organized with a title intending to make people believe that it was composed of Congressmen or Congress itself, and Mr. Richardson, I think—foolishly, as I think he would have said himself, probably, after his experience with the matter—improperly turned those plates over to this association for some compensation. What that was I know nothing about. I think he had no control over the matter, had no part in the deceit and fraud which was practiced; but whoever had charge of this association immediately started out to lie to the public. I am afraid we never will be able through legislation to compel all book agents to confine themselves strictly to the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The records show that Mr. Richardson received a royalty of 75 cents per set from this company, and that his total receipts from the use of the plates was something like $11,250.

Mr. MANN. Well, he made an agreement and I do not know what the agreement was. I know this, that if Congress were as careful as it ought to be it would not through a spirit of generosity present anything to any Member of the House who is not entitled to it under the law, and even now we have become so stingy that most of the gentlemen on that side of the House are going to lose most of their August salary. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. PAR. 1. The Joint Committee on Printing shall appoint a clerk, an inspector, and a stenographer, at $3,000, $2,000, and $1,000 per annum, respectively, to be appropriated for and paid by the Secretary of the Senate. The clerk and inspector as provided for in this section shall each give bond for the faithful performance of their respective duties in the sum of $5,000, to be approved by the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Would the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] have any objection to an amendment to strike out the language "Secretary of the Senate" and insert in lieu thereof "Clerk of the House of Representatives"?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it makes any difference whatever, so that they receive their money. The purpose of fixing it in that way was that the pay responsibility should not be divided. It all comes out of the general fund, anyhow. This simplifies matters.

Mr. MANN. In the main I am in favor of the pending bill, but it seems to me that we ought not to entirely eliminate the House of Representatives when it comes to the term "Congress." Here is a proposition to give to the Joint Committee on Printing absolute power over the expenditure of $5,000,000 which is expended in the Government Printing Office. The Joint Committee on Printing is presided over by a Senator. He, in effect, names the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing. The clerk practically acts as the Joint Committee on Printing during vacations of Congress, if we ever have any more, and has a great influence and must have great influence on the Joint Committee on Printing when Congress is in session.

Now, heretofore he has felt somewhat under obligations to the House because he received half of his pay, as he does now, from the Clerk of the House. He is obliged to be courteous at least to the Clerk of the House, if not to the Members of the House. Now, he proposes in this bill to have his salary paid to him entirely by the Secretary of the Senate. He serves under a Senator; he is named by a Senator; he is paid by the Senate. He is considered, and necessarily, as an employee of the Senate. Now, the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing—the very efficient present one, and very capable and very courteous—is only human. I have noticed through an experience of some years that a man is always more courteous to the person from whom he receives his pay than he is to anybody else. Yet we propose here to deliberately cut out even in name the House of Representatives and to have this clerk paid by the Secretary of the Senate.

You say it is a matter of convenience to have him paid by one person. All right. As he is named by the Senate, let him be paid by the Clerk of the House instead of the Secretary of the Senate. Then he would be very courteous to the Members of the House who go to see him, because he gets his pay from the House. He will be courteous to the Senate, because he gets his appointment from the Senate, but if he gets both from the Senate he will tell us to "go to."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

It is immaterial to the committee as to who will be the paymaster of the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing and its other employees. But I want to correct the impression that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has doubtless unintentionally given, and that is that the selection of the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing is done by any Senator. The clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing under the law is elected by a vote of the membership of the joint committee, composed of three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate. Therefore no Senator has any authority or any right to name the clerk of the committee. But this position is an especially important one. It requires a man who has expert knowledge of paper, and he must really be the referee for the Joint Committee on Printing in many of these matters that come before the committee, and under the provision of this law there has been an enlargement to the extent that he is placed under a $5,000 bond for the faithful performance of his duty in the matter of aiding the Joint Committee on Printing in passing upon the kind of paper and material that is purchased for the Government Printing Office.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois wants to make a motion to amend the bill by changing the paymaster from the Secretary of the Senate to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEEB). Does the gentleman from Indiana withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 3, line 9, by striking out the words "Secretary of the Senate" and inserting in lieu thereof "Clerk of the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 9, strike out the words "Secretary of the Senate" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Clerk of the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. PAR. 2. The Joint Committee on Printing shall fix upon standards of paper of every description which, in its judgment, will be required by the Government Printing Office for all the purposes of the public printing and binding for the several executive departments, independent offices, and establishments of the Government, and the Public Printer shall, under the direction of the said committee, advertise in two newspapers or trade journals published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, and San Francisco and secure proposals to furnish the Government with paper, as specified in the schedule prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing and to be furnished to applicants by the Public Printer, setting forth in detail the quantities and qualities required for the public printing and binding, and the Public Printer shall furnish samples of the standards of papers fixed upon to applicants therefor who may desire to bid.

Mr. BARNHART and Mr. GOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is recognized.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer three committee amendments to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers three committee amendments. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 19, after the words "San Francisco," strike out the words "and secure" and insert the words "for sealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 4, lines 21 and 22, after the word "printing" in line 21, strike out the words "and to be furnished to applicants by the Public Printer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 4, line 24, after the word "furnish," insert the words "a schedule and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee this question: I presume the purpose of advertising for bids in this paragraph is to secure numerous applicants for the contracts. Is that it?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; to secure by advertisement and specific notice bids on contracts to be let.

Mr. BATHRICK. Are there any large trade journals circulating among those establishments that provide paper? Are they not particularly published in trade journals that circulate among those establishments?

Mr. BARNHART. It says "trade journals or newspapers."

Mr. BATHRICK. It says "advertise in two newspapers or trade journals" in the cities named. What is the object of saying "newspapers," ordinary newspapers?

Mr. BARNHART. There might not be a trade journal in a locality where there is a large paper manufacturing or paper selling industry.

Mr. BATHRICK. Has the gentleman ever calculated the possible cost of naming a schedule of the quality and quantity of the paper he desires to buy and the cost of advertising?

Mr. BARNHART. The total cost will be something like $1,000 a year as proposed and that is a reduction from the present number of publications.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman thinks it will be less than a thousand dollars?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; I think it will be less than that. But I want to explain further to the gentleman from Ohio, who is a business man and understands that these contractors are patrons of clipping bureaus. They have clipping bureaus that provide them with all sorts of notices having to do with their business. The purpose of this variety of publicity localities is to secure advertisements all over the United States in such places as would produce the best results possible.

Mr. BATHRICK. I will say that the gentleman's explanation is very satisfactory. I had no idea that the cost of advertising could be so little.

Mr. BARNHART. These advertisements merely announce that there will be a letting of contracts, and that the plans and specifications may be had upon application.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a few letters and a newspaper article on the subject of the distribution of the Messages of the Presidents.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOOD. This section provides for advertisements in two newspapers or trade journals published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, and San Francisco for proposals to furnish the Government with paper. Not more than six months ago, at an expense of about $70,000, a committee composed of the Secretary of the Treasury and the other members of the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board made a trip over this country to locate the various Federal reserve banks, and they selected certain cities that were regarded as the great commercial centers of the United States. It seems to me that if that information is worth anything—if it is worth anything like what it cost—it ought to be followed by a committee in bringing out a great bill like this.

I am surprised to see that the committee has inserted the city of Washington and the city of Baltimore, cities not mentioned by the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board, but has failed to insert the city of Richmond and the city of Atlanta. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Why is it that all of the cities named in this provision are cities of the North? Why is it that you have not named Richmond, or New Orleans, or Kansas City, or Galveston, or Dallas, or some of the other southern cities where the Government should insert in the newspapers advertisements for bids? Is it possible that advertisements in the newspapers for paper in those cities would be worthless? The Government purchases a large amount of paper from the South, especially from West Virginia. Is it possible that the Committee on Printing does not regard those cities as of sufficient importance to even insert a newspaper advertisement there?

I want to congratulate the city of Baltimore that it is again placed upon the map. But what of Richmond? Where are the gentlemen from Virginia to-day at this home-coming of the House [laughter], when the great city of Richmond is being discriminated against, and has been entirely left out of consideration in this bill? The newspapers of that city will not be permitted to publish and therefore to receive pay for publishing advertisements for paper? Where is Atlanta, placed on the map by the organization committee of the reserve board? Even great Atlanta is not mentioned.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will not the gentleman pay a tribute of appreciation to the generosity of Atlanta and Richmond in yielding to Baltimore and these other cities some matters of commercial importance?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; and I was wondering about Colorado. I fail to see Denver on the map as reported by the gentleman's committee.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. We have relinquished our claims to Kansas City.

Mr. GOOD. But Kansas City is not on the list. I simply wished to call the attention of the committee to this matter. I suppose the committee had some good explanation for this discrimination, but I do not know what it is. The discrimination calls for an explanation.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the very entertaining but far-fetched remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, I had explained in a previous statement that the advertisements in these cities are not based upon their being commercial centers or financial centers, but upon the fact that they are the cities in which are located some of the largest paper manufacturers and paper dealers, and they are located so we could probably get the broadest advertisement in those localities. For instance, San Francisco is a great coast city and Chicago and St. Louis are centers of the great West. We omitted some of the cities from the former list that we had because we received few replies from advertisements in papers published in those cities.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. How about Washington? Is there a paper manufacturer in the city of Washington?

Mr. BARNHART. No; but there are some of the most extensive paper dealers in the United States represented here.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the newspapers——

Mr. BARNHART. As I understand it, many paper manufacturers in the country have agents in Washington. Now, Mr. Chairman, this little notice, of which the gentleman is making much ado, is about a 6 or 7 inch single-column advertisement, and it is of little consequence really, because the world at large sees very little of it. It is purely a paper-trade matter.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know whether the committee, in considering the cities where this printing should be done, considered the city of Kalamazoo, which has the largest book-print paper mills in the world?

Mr. BARNHART. I will say to the gentleman that the committee did consider it, but the committee understands that most of the product of the Kalamazoo mills is marketed through the city of Chicago and other big commercial centers. There are many paper agencies in the city of Chicago and elsewhere, and we could not extend this to all the cities that have paper mills. In fact, we cut out about four cities that we had used heretofore, because very small or inconsequential results had been obtained from advertisements published therein.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if he considered putting the advertisement in the Portland or Seattle papers?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know that we considered that, but we decided that a San Francisco publication would reach those cities through the trade journals and clipping bureaus to which I have referred.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that I think he is mistaken about the paper mills of the Pacific coast being in the neighborhood of San Francisco. They are on the Columbia River and on Puget Sound, and one of the largest manufacturers in the United States of print paper used in the publication of books is located at Everett, in the State of Washington. I do not understand why you did not provide for printing the advertisement at a place in some one of those Northwestern States.

Mr. BARNHART. I have no explanation of it, except that which I have stated, just as I explained to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH], that these are the same cities that have been on the list heretofore. The fact that there are a number of paper mills on some river in the Northwest does not necessarily indicate that the agents of those mills are not located at San Francisco or some other great commercial center.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is it a fact that the gentleman made no investigation about the matter, but simply followed the old list, because he saw San Francisco there, and made no investigation about the Northwest?

Mr. BARNHART. The committee followed it for the reason that the cities mentioned in this bill have been used for this advertising purpose for a good many years, and the results have been eminently satisfactory, so we saw no occasion for changing. But, on the other hand, we did see the lack of necessity for using as many cities as had been used before, and with the consent of the Public Printer and agreement of all concerned we decided that it would be just as well to drop about four of the cities that we have been using heretofore, because we realized that the few bids from these cities would come through other notices anyway.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I will ask the gentleman if the committee would be willing to include Kalamazoo?

Mr. BARNHART. I think it is hardly necessary to do that.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I move to insert in line 17, after the word "of" and before the word "Boston," the word "Kalamazoo."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 17, after the word "of" where it occurs the second time, insert the word "Kalamazoo."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. J. M. C. SMITH) there were—ayes 23, noes 35.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I move to amend by inserting the word "Seattle" after the words "San Francisco" in line 19, page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 19, after the words "San Francisco," insert the word "Seattle."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on this amendment for a moment.

I offer this amendment because of the fact that the great timber region of this country on the Pacific coast is not at San Francisco. I do not have the facts at hand, but I have no doubt myself that most of the wood pulp and paper of the Pacific coast is made in the States of Oregon and Washington. I know the great paper supply of the Pacific Northwest is in that portion of the country. I know there are paper mills on the Columbia River, very large ones, and in other portions of the States of Washington and Oregon. I do not understand why the advertisement should be inserted at San Francisco, a thousand miles away from the timber region where paper is produced.

The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken about San Francisco papers circulating much in the Northwest. I want the gentleman from Indiana to recollect that it is fully a thousand miles by rail from San Francisco to Seattle.

At Everett, where the gentleman from Washington, my colleague, Mr. FALCONER, lives, they have a large mill producing book paper exclusively. I can not understand why you should not have an advertisement in the region which produces the paper, instead of a thousand miles away, and I suppose the only reason is that the committee followed the custom without making any investigation whatever.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. FALCONER. What method outside of newspaper advertisement does the Government have for bringing to the attention of paper concerns the quality of the paper desired for the purposes of the Government?

Mr. BARNHART. The Government Printing Office has a list of every concern in the country that it can secure, and sends to them notice of these lettings and the specifications besides.

Mr. FALCONER. The specifications are bound in pamphlet form, something like what the gentleman has on his desk?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. I want to say that a few months ago I sent the Everett Paper & Pulp Mill, which is a large manufacturing paper plant, turning out the finest quality of book paper, a list and specifications required, and I received a letter saying that they were glad to get it, as it gave them a better idea than any trade journal had given them before. That was probably two months ago.

Mr. BARNHART. If those gentlemen had read the advertisement, if they had seen the trade paper, it was their fault if they have not received the schedules, because they are invited to send for them.

Mr. FALCONER. The gentleman from Indiana said that they were sent out by the department.

Mr. BARNHART. I said they were sent to all paper contractors.

Mr. FALCONER. Then they do not send them to the mills?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; they send to all that are on their list.

Mr. FALCONER. Does not the gentleman think it would be advisable to insert advertisements in papers that are less than a thousand miles from the plant?

Mr. BARNHART. Does not the mill referred to by the gentleman have an agency at San Francisco and also at Chicago?

Mr. FALCONER. Why have an agency at San Francisco or Chicago?

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman has had any experience in buying paper, he will know that we rarely buy it of the mills that manufacture it, but of jobbers. I know in newspaper and job stock, and very largely the Government purchases, we buy of agents, jobbing and wholesale houses, and not direct from the mills. In some instances large mills do furnish it direct by contract, but ordinarily they have jobbing houses that take all the product of the mills. The product of the mills, as I understand it, is sold very largely in advance. The paper agents take the whole product of the mill. I remember for many years during my business experience I bought of the J. W. Butler Paper Co., of Chicago, Kalamazoo paper.

Mr. FALCONER. I have no interest in a paper getting an advertisement; it is a matter of efficiency in getting the supply. It occurs to me that when paper is manufactured from raw material in a locality it might be advisable to advertise in that vicinity. I am glad to have the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana, but I see no reason why we should not advertise in the Seattle papers and in the Everett papers.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, by way of explanation, we might place advertisements in towns and cities all over the United States where there is a paper agent and where there is a paper mill, but it has been the experience of the committee that we get the same results in the present method, because this is merely an announcement of letting, and these agents, I think—those who contract on an extensive scale—are patrons of commercial clipping bureaus and get the notices of lettings through them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that you have not designated a single city in that portion of the country where the great timber supply is, and not only that, but in all that great Northwest where two-thirds of the paper supply of the United States is, you have not designated a single city.

Mr. BARNHART. Neither have we as to the supply of strawboard or bristol board or the finest quality of writing paper.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has the floor.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that San Francisco is not the whole Pacific coast. The city of Seattle is some nine hundred and odd miles distant from San Francisco. Baltimore and Washington are 40 miles apart, and yet there are advertisements in the respective papers of those two cities. Apparently to the limited mental horizon of an easterner from the State of Indiana a thousand miles on the Pacific coast does not amount to as much as 40 miles in this part of the country. It seems to me the gentleman ought to enlarge his mental vision a little and get some idea of the great western country.

Mr. COADY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FALCONER. No; I have not the time. I think the gentleman ought to give some consideration to a country about which he knows so little. He should study the map and get some idea of the natural resources and the products of the mills in that country and then give those people fair play and bring to their attention the product the Government desires, and in doing that I think he would make a better presiding officer over his committee than he does at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee profoundly apologizes for not being familiar with the conditions of the United States, like his more intelligent friend from Washington. However, this matter has been gone over carefully by the committee, and I hold in my hand a list of 255 addresses of paper manufacturers and jobbers throughout the United States to whom notices of lettings are regularly mailed. In addition to that, practically every trade paper in the United States, if it is not in one of these cities where notices are officially published, carries these notices as matters of news, and thereby we get the widest dissemination of this information.

Mr. FALCONER. Where does the gentleman get this list?

Mr. BARNHART. This is a list used by the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. FALCONER. Showing the mills manufacturing paper in the United States?

Mr. BARNHART. No; the jobbers and the mills both. If the gentleman from Washington finds that he has a mill in his district that is not represented upon this list, I know the joint committee would be delighted at any time to see that it gets on the list.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman then please see that there is placed on the list the name of Everett Pulp & Paper Mill, the finest paper manufacturing concern in the United States.

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Is it not a fact that most of the Government purchases of coated papers are from mills in Pennsylvania and West Virginia?

Mr. BARNHART. No. On the other hand, I think we get most of it now from Ohio.

Mr. GOOD. Is not the freight rate from a long distance very great?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, that would be true, no doubt, as to the far West.

Mr. GOOD. As I understand it, the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co. is one of the largest concerns that furnishes the Government with coated paper. That being true, I wondered why some advertisements were not inserted in that section of the country.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I could not explain the matter more fully and more intelligently than I have already done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15902, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD requests leave of absence for Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin until September 7, 1914, on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD requests leave of absence, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from New York ill over at the New York convention? I am sorry that he was taken sick there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a request for leave of absence for Mr. POWERS indefinitely, on account of the illness of his wife and of himself—physician's certificate forwarded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to file a report from the Committee on Insular Affairs on the bill H. R. 18459, and to ask that permission be given such members of the minority who desire to do so to file minority or individual reports within five days.

Mr. MANN. The report goes in the basket.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. The gentleman from Virginia asks that the minority have five days in which to file a report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a review of the record of the Democratic Congress and the administration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks leave to extend his remarks on the record of the Democratic Congress and administration. Is there objection——

Mr. MANN. While I blush for the gentleman, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, August 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LOGUE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 3342) for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1114), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1115), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 18529) providing for the erection of a statue in memory of the life and public service of Gen. John A. Logan; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. WINGO: A bill (H. R. 18530) providing for the issuance of circulating notes to producers of cotton, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BROUSSARD: A bill (H. R. 18531) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to certify to the Secretary of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, lands in the State of Louisiana not needed for naval purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. KINDEL: A bill (H. R. 18532) to regulate the employment of Government employees by officials, etc.; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. KETTNER: A bill (H. R. 18533) making an appropriation for the protection of Imperial Valley, Cal.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. HOWARD: Resolution (H. Res. 605) to amend Rule XV of the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee: Resolution (H. Res. 606) for the consideration of House bill 18459; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 18534) granting an increase of pension to Sylvester Clemings; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOWDLE: A bill (H. R. 18535) granting a pension to Patrick Lysaght; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 18536) granting a pension to William H. Mayo; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DONOHOE: A bill (H. R. 18537) granting an increase of pension to Christiana Hoffman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18538) granting an increase of pension to Mary Coffee; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 18539) for the relief of the estate of Wade Baker; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 18540) granting a pension to Cora C. O'Neil; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RAUCH: A bill (H. R. 18541) granting a pension to Charles W. Beck; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18542) granting an increase of pension to Emiline Farrar; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18543) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. Gallion; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18544) granting an increase of pension to Orlando A. Newton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUPLEY: A bill (H. R. 18545) granting an increase of pension to Sallie K. Burkholder; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18546) granting an increase of pension to Carrie Sanno; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 18547) granting an increase of pension to Anna Robbins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALLIN: A bill (H. R. 18548) granting a pension to Mary E. Wilcox; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 18549) for the relief of Frederick Coutier; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of the American Importers' Association of the United States of America, favoring passage of bill for American merchant marine; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also (by request), petition of N. C. Newerf, offering suggestions for the disposition of the Philippines and a solution of the Japanese problem; to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Also (by request), petition of N. C. Newerf, relative to bill for Government merchant and naval marine; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. BAILEY (by request): Petition of sundry citizens of New York City, favoring enactment of a measure prohibiting the export of food and clothing during the European war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 27, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is House bill 15657.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are about half a dozen Senators in the Chamber, and I think we ought to have a quorum. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Myers	Sterling
Bankhead	Fletcher	Norris	Thornton
Brady	Gallinger	Overman	Vardaman
Bryan	Jones	Perkins	Walsh
Burton	Kenyon	Pittman	West
Camden	Kern	Poindexter	White
Clapp	McLean	Sheppard
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. REED entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to announce the continued absence of my colleague [Mr. PAGE], he being detained in Vermont on account of illness in his family.

Mr. GORE entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is no quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate heretofore given and request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. FALL, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. LANE, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. LEE of Maryland, and Mr. HITCHCOCK entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 10 of the bill, an amendment, proposed by the committee, to strike out the penalty clause, was passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, on page 10, the committee amendment proposing to strike out lines 22, 23, 24, and 25 was passed over. The lines read as follows:

> A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have just returned to the Chamber, and I heard only the latter part of the proposition now before the Senate read, but as I understand that proposition it is to strike out the language on lines 22 to 25, on page 10, which reads:

> A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I wish to inquire if that is the proposition before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the pending question. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Senator to yield to me long enough to offer an amendment that I shall propose when section 4 of the bill is reached in the Senate.

Mr. REED. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE. I am afraid I did not make myself clearly understood yesterday in my suggestions with reference to section 4. I should like to submit an amendment as a substitute for section 4, and have it printed, that Senators may consider it before the bill is finally disposed of. I also ask that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table for the present, and will also be printed in the RECORD, at the request of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WHITE to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, viz: On page 4, line 13, strike out all of section 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. That it shall not be lawful to embody a condition in any contract relating to the sale or lease of or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person whomsoever, or the effect of which will be to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire from any person whomsoever any article or class of articles not protected by the patent, and all contracts embracing any such conditions shall be null and void; and any person other than the purchaser, lessee, or licensee violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. REED. I understand the proposition now is to strike out the language I have referred to. Mr. President, I am opposed to striking out that penalty clause. I am opposed to it for all the reasons advanced in the argument regarding section 4.

To my mind a corporation ought not to be permitted to own the capital stock of another corporation, with the single exception that a corporation might be permitted to become the owner of capital stock in the same way that corporations are permitted to become the owners of real estate, where they are obliged to take it for debt; but in such an instance the corporation ought not to be permitted to vote the stock in the other corporation. We are not dealing with that specific question now, because the immediate amendment relates simply to the question of penalty.

I shall occupy the attention of the Senate only a few moments. I want to know that this proposition is thoroughly understood, and to make it understood is about all that I intend to attempt to do.

Section 8 provides in effect that no corporation engaged in commerce shall directly or indirectly acquire the capital stock of "another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

The committee agrees to that doctrine; and you will observe that it is limited in its operation simply to the acquisition of stock where the effect of it is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition or to create monopoly. I do not know why we should not as to that kind of act prescribe the same kind of penalty as we do for the commission of those acts prohibited by the Sherman law. The Sherman law makes every combination in restraint of trade, every attempt to restrain trade, punishable by fine and imprisonment. The right is also reserved to the civil court to prevent the wrong. My attention has also been called to the fact that the second paragraph of section 8 covers holding companies. The provision is:

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them—

And so forth.

If it is right to retain in the Sherman law a provision that any attempt to restrain commerce shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, why should not that same penalty be attached to these particular acts, the necessary and inevitable effect of which, if carried to any considerable extent, is to lessen competition? Why should we make a different classification here? Why should we, as to these particular practices, deal with them any differently than we do with the other practices or devices, all of which are employed by those seeking to restrain commerce? I do not intend to take the time of the Senate to repeat all that was said yesterday in regard to section 4, but every word of it with reference to section 4 is equally applicable here.

There is no chance for a mistake. The corporation that goes out and acquires the capital of another corporation, and begins to use it for the purpose of controlling that other corporation and lessening the competition between itself and that other corporation knows exactly what it is doing, just as much as men know what they are doing when they engage in any conspiracy in restraint of trade. The gentleman who goes out and organizes a holding company, and gathers into that holding company a large number of competitive corporations, knows that by and through the organization of that holding company he is building a monopoly in this land; he knows that he is doing it for the very purpose of restraining trade; and that that is about the only reason why he ever adopts such a device.

This proposed law does not apply to the holding company for one corporation; that is permissible; it applies only when there is brought together in a holding company two or more corporations, the object being, through the holding company, to control two or more corporations and thus build up a monopoly.

I do not know to what extent Senators have studied the question of holding companies; but I say to the Senate that it is one of the favorite methods now employed by those who build monopoly. Instead of combining them together in one corporation, or instead of pooling the stock of a number of corporations and putting it in the hands of voting trustees—instead of resorting to the old, crude device of the builder of monopoly—they have now adopted the method of the holding company. I could by sending to my office and getting my memoranda and documents, I think, make this so plain that no one would doubt it, and I will do so if it is necessary; but I will say that the common practice that is now being employed is this: Here are two or three competing concerns in one community, two or three competing concerns in another community, and a half dozen other competing concerns in other communities, all of them to a greater or lesser extent in competition with each other. Accordingly, some enterprising gentleman proceeds to organize what is known as a holding company. It is a separate corporation, and its assets consist of the stock of these various independent and competing companies. It gathers a majority of that stock in these competing companies into its treasury, and against that capital thus acquired it proceeds to issue its own stock and its own bonds.

It follows, therefore, that the officers of the holding company become the dominant force in each one of the companies, the majority of the stock of which has been covered into the treasury of the holding company; and at once the competition has been ended between those companies, because the common stockholder of the majority of the stock of each of the formerly competing companies is not going to permit competition to go on which will lessen profits.

Why should that not be punished? Why should we deal gently with this device? Why should we not meet it by a penalty that will arrest it? We have started in here saying that we were going to select those well-known devices employed by monopolists the natural effect of which is to restrain trade, and that we propose to stop those practices. As I said yesterday, the President has told us in his message of last January that certain of these practices are now well known, and none is better known than the one to which I refer.

I know of an instance in the State of Iowa, so well and so ably represented by my friend upon the other side, where one of these holding companies, having acquired large interests in various cities in the State, has through its agents threatened with annihilation institutions that have refused to sell to it. I understand it to be a fact that something like 200 concerns in the State of Michigan have been united under one management in this way; but I do not care to take the time more than to state the facts in this brief way.

I insist, Mr. President, that as to this section the penalty clause should be retained. It was put here by the House of Representatives and ought to stay here, and I shall at the proper time ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment striking it out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not concur with the Senator from Missouri with respect to this section, for several reasons, which I will state with the utmost brevity. Wherever a stockholding interest amounts to a restraint of trade or is an attempt to monopolize or is a monopolization of any trade or commerce the offense is already punishable under the antitrust act, with which the section now under consideration does not interfere in any way.

The Senator from Missouri was not quite accurate in saying that the antitrust law condemned and made criminal an attempt to restrain trade. I do not recall the statute in that way. I think it makes unlawful any restraint of trade or commerce, and it makes unlawful any attempt to monopolize or any monopolization, but does not include the attempt to restrain trade, unless it is also an attempt to create a monopoly. Therefore, wherever intercorporate stockholding results in a restraint of trade or results in monopoly it is already punishable in the criminal courts.

I have always very much doubted whether we needed any additional legislation with regard to what are ordinarily known as holding companies; that is, where one company holds the stock or controls the stock of two or more corporations which are engaged in a competitive business. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Northern Securities case, which presented directly the simplest form of a holding company, seems to have put that question in a position where it can be little helped by any additional legislation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator if the Supreme Court in that case held that any holding by a corporation of the stock of two other competing corporations was illegal under the Sherman Antitrust Act?

Mr. CUMMINS. It did not so declare in express terms.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So, it seems to me, when we remember the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and the Tobacco Trust cases, in which they expressly held that every restraint of trade was not a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, but that some of them were reasonable and some were unreasonable, and that the restraint condemned was an unreasonable restraint of trade, that the rule laid down in this proposed statute is quite a different one from the rule of the Sherman antitrust law as construed by the Supreme Court. This proposed statute would make any holding, whether it was reasonable or unreasonable, of the stock of competing corporations by a holding company unlawful. It may not be unlawful under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator from Washington is entirely mistaken with regard to the section that we are now considering, although that is what the section ought to do. I am not opposing additional legislation with regard to holding companies. The Northern Securities case presented this situation: A company organized under the laws of New Jersey, called the Northern Securities Co., became the owner of a controlling interest in the stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and the Great Northern Railroad Co., and the Supreme Court held that, inasmuch as these two railroads were and are competing companies, it was a restraint of trade for one company, even though it did not enter into the operation at all of the property, to own a controlling interest in both. I only suggest that for the purpose of indicating that wherever a holding company does actually restrain trade or does establish a monopoly or attempts to establish a monopoly we have a penal statute which applies to it.

That, however, is not my chief reason for believing that it is not wise to attach a criminal penalty to this section. I intend to offer a substitute for this section, and I necessarily argue the case from the standpoint of the substitute I shall offer. I do not believe in the section as it is, and I would have a good deal of trouble in voting for it, although I suppose I might as a last resort. I believe that instead of strengthening the law it rather weakens the law.

The amendment which I shall propose includes the existing situation as well as the future situation; that is to say, it makes it unlawful for one corporation to own the stock of another, the two being competing corporations, no matter when the stock was acquired.

We shall do very little to help the business of this country unless we can readjust the holdings which now exist; for, as I said yesterday, the business of this country is so completely crystallized, the lines have been so thoroughly established, that unless we can introduce competition where it is now substantially suppressed we shall not afford the people of the country the relief for which they are asking, and to which they are entitled. If the Senate adopts the amendment which I shall offer and which will apply to existing holdings as well as to future acquisitions, then, of course, it is clear that we ought not to make those holdings criminal offenses if they were lawful at the time they were acquired. Indeed, we probably could not if we would, and it would not be fair and just to do it if we could.

I believe that with the section as it is now proposed it would be unjust to attach a criminal penalty. See how it reads:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition * * * or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Of course, that is already absolutely taken care of, and it would be absurd, if I may be permitted to use that word, to retain that phrase, "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce." If we are to put that in, of course there ought to be a penalty, because we already have penalized that offense, and we must not disturbe the antitrust law. I am anticipating, however, the argument which I shall briefly make when I shall come to offer my amendment. It ought to be obvious to anybody that if we redeclare the very offense that is declared in the antitrust law, and do not attach a penalty to it, we shall have repealed the antitrust law to that extent; and I think no one desires to do that.

But the further difficulty about the section as it is, as I view it, arises from the paragraph on page 9. If we are to give that latitude to this practice, I am not willing to say that a man who makes this mistake in applying it to his own affairs shall become a criminal.

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

That is reasonably clear.

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business—

I challenge anybody to give such an illustration or definition of the clause I have just read as will make it clear so that it furnishes any real guide to men in conducting their business—or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

When we attach a penalty to an act, it ought to be much more clearly understood than it would be understood under the language of this section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. It occurred to me that the framer of the bill doubtless had in mind the very common case of the establishment of branch stores. The parent corporation would like to establish a branch store in some distant city. Suppose they are engaged in the dry-goods trade, for instance. Claflin & Co. are an instance of what we have in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. They have a store in Chicago, as I understand. They have a store in St. Louis. Those two stores, I take it, do not substantially compete.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not quite appreciate that view, although it undoubtedly was the view of the authors of the section. We forbid, in the first place, intercorporate stockholding where the effect would be to substantially lessen competition as between two corporations. We proceed to make an exception to that rule in this proviso that eliminates subsidiary corporations. Therefore it is evident that the framers of the section thought there were some subsidiary corporations which would fall within the operation of the first part of the section unless expressly withdrawn. I do not understand that phase of it.

Mr. WALSH. No; let me show the Senator that is not quite accurate, because that likewise is qualified in the same way:

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

If it is, the subsidiary corporations are equally condemned.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the effect is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition, it does not come within the original condemnation.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then why should there be the exception? I have been utterly at a loss, in endeavoring to discover the application of the paragraph to which we have just referred, to know to what case it would apply. I assume it must be intended to apply to a case or a class of cases; but it is unnecessary for me to extend my remarks upon that subject. If the amendment I shall propose is adopted—and I hope it will be—then I do not think there ought to be, and probably there could not be, a penal provision attached to it, and I intend to work in my votes toward the accomplishment of that purpose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Does the Senator desire to ask me a question?

Mr. REED. I wish to make a suggestion. The first thing to do is to perfect this section and, in perfecting it, to deal with this section. When it is perfected, then if the Senator desires to offer a substitute we have the choice between his substitute and the amendment in its completed form. I do not think the Senator means to say that he proposes to vote against the penalty clause in this section because the section that he proposes to put in as a substitute—which may not be accepted—will be so drawn that a penalty should not be attached to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is one of the reasons I would not vote for a penalty attached to this section, because it is utterly impossible for anybody to determine what this section means or to what cases it would apply; and I think the Senator from Missouri agrees with me that before you penalize a person you ought to make it reasonably certain to him what he can do and what he can not do. The corporation that is here called upon to act must undertake to say, first, whether the acquisition of the stock of another corporation will substantially lessen competition between them. It must first undertake to say whether they are competitive in character, then whether the acquisition of stock will substantially lessen the rivalry between them. Then it must undertake to decide whether the one is a subsidiary corporation, whether it is really a branch or carrying forward of business in which the parent corporation, if I may use that term, is engaged. When you have surrounded a declaration of invalidity with all those indefinite exceptions and contingencies, I do not think it is fair to attach a criminal penalty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator says this is a meaningless section. That is the amount of it. That is pretty nearly what his language means. Does the Senator think we ought to enact any law that is a miserable jumble of indefiniteness, if I may use that sort of an expression? If that is true, the objection of the Senator ought to be to the whole section.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to the whole section, because I intend to offer a substitute for it.

Mr. REED. I do not think the Senator ought to take the position that he will vote against a penal clause in this section upon the theory that he is going to offer a substitute of an entirely different nature. The question we are now considering is whether or not a penal clause should be attached to this section, and I do not think that ought to be determined by the fact that somebody proposes to offer a substitute for the section.

I think it is a little unfortunate that we are proceeding with this particular amendment to this section before we go through the section, but it appears to me that every argument that has been made here as to why a penal clause should not be attached is simply an argument in favor of its attachment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If this section is, as the Senator from Iowa intimates, so drawn that it covers those practices already covered by the Sherman law, then clearly the penalty ought to be attached; and the Senator agrees to that. There is one part of this section that is not clearly covered by the Sherman law, and that is the holding company; and a man dealing with a holding-company proposition just as much knows that he proposes to restrain trade as any man does who adopts any other device.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri has misunderstood me a little. I do not think all the things contained in the first paragraph of the section are embraced in the Sherman law. What I said was that the last clause—namely, "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce"—is clearly a repetition of the offense created in the Sherman law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I rose to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the question before the Senate is the amendment of this section which is proposed to be stricken out. I wish to vote intelligently upon this matter, and I want the law to mean something when it is enacted. It seems to me the Senator from Iowa should introduce his amendment or substitute with a view of perfecting this section before it goes out. It may be that it will not go out when it is perfected by the Senator's proposition; and now is the time to do it, rather than waiting until after this matter is acted upon. If his amendment is proposed and acted upon, it may be that certain amendments may be made to it which would be accepted by the Senate; and I submit to the Senator that now is the time to propose his amendment to this section.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would seem to be logical; but we are proceeding under a rule which requires the consideration of committee amendments first. I have more than once made inquiry with regard to it, and I do not feel that under the parliamentary situation I can offer my substitute now. If I can——

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the committee amendment—striking it out?

Mr. CULBERSON. The committee amendment is to strike out the penalty provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee amendment is to strike out the lines which contain a penalty.

Mr. CULBERSON. The other committee amendments to this section have been already adopted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was under the impression it was a motion to strike out the section.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can test the situation by offering it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think it would be well for the Senator from Iowa to offer his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about the parliamentary situation. The committee amendments must be first considered. There is no question about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. But may not a substitute for the text which is proposed to be stricken out by the committee be offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what the Senator from Iowa proposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a substitute for the text proposed to be stricken out. It is a substitute for the entire section, the Chair understands.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I propose to offer is a substitute for the entire section.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a different proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it were a substitute for the part proposed to be striken out by the committee, it would be in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were at liberty to do so, of course I would offer it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the committee amendment must first be voted upon, and then a substitute for the entire section may be considered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in this connection I do not know, of course, what the proposed amendment of the Senator from Iowa is, but I propose to offer an amendment to the section—or, rather, two amendments. I should like to state at this time, before offering the amendment——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Washington if he would not permit the proposed substitute of the Senator from Iowa to be read. It is a very involved question now, and for myself I should like to know what the proposed substitute is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read it a day or two ago; but, of course, some Senators now present were not here. I send to the desk the substitute, which I shall offer at the proper time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read for information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 8, as amended and as proposed to be amended, insert:

It shall be unlawful for any corporation to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of two or more corporations engaged in commerce and carrying on business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prevent corporations not engaged in commerce acquiring, owning, and holding capital stock or other share capital solely for investment and not using the same in bringing about, or attempting to bring about, a common control of the corporations whose stock or other share capital it owns and holds.

It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control of any other corporation also engaged in commerce and carrying on a business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Of course, on hearing the proposed substitute read one may not get it exactly correct, but as I heard it it makes two provisions—one prohibiting a corporation from owning stock, broadly stated, of course, in two or more corporations, and the other is a prohibition against a corporation holding stock in any other corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one discrimination which possibly the Senator from Minnesota did not catch. The first paragraph covers the holding company. The holding company may not be engaged in commerce, and there is no limitation in the first paragraph that the corporation must be engaged in commerce; that is, any corporation which holds the stock of two or more corporations which are engaged in commerce. That is the first paragraph. The second paragraph covers the case where the corporation engaged in commerce holds the stock of another corporation also engaged in commerce.

Mr. CLAPP. I caught the latter part, but in the reading the first did not appear plain. The explanation of the Senator from Iowa makes it very plain.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Chair to rule that the committee amendment must first be acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did so hold.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when the interruption came I had about completed what I was going to say.

The Senator from Iowa agrees that wherever a holding company exists and its tendency or natural effect is to restrain trade it should be treated as a crime and punished, as I understand him.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the antitrust law. I do not desire to withdraw any of its efficiency.

Mr. REED. I know. We all go back always to the antitrust law. We continue to do things here, and every time we discuss them, however, we say they are all covered by the antitrust law. If they are covered by the antitrust law, we have no business to fool with them or to do anything with them.

I do not think that that question is yet quite understood. If the Government brings an action against an institution and charges it with being a trust or a monopoly, the Government must prove the fact that it is a trust or monopoly and that it has actually restrained trade. I think these sections go a little further in that where the effect of the stock purchase is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

The difficulty is that we have changed the language of the House bill. The language of the bill as passed by the House had a distinct meaning and a distinctly different meaning from the bill as reported by the Senate committee. I am inclined to think that under the language as it is here reported by the Senate committee we may not have covered as to the second paragraph of the section anything that is not covered by the Sherman law, but as the bill came to us from the House it did cover, I think, more than the Sherman law, because as the bill came here from the House in both paragraphs 1 and 2 of the section the language was "or to create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community."

There is a difference between a general restraint of trade and the creation of a general monopoly and the restraint of trade in a particular community or section. However that may be, I put this question——

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator passes from that, section 2 of the Sherman Act denounces monopoly of any part of commerce. It is held——

Mr. REED. Geographically.

Mr. WALSH. Geographically as well as in quantity. So that so far as monopoly is concerned there can be no distinction.

Mr. REED. If that is true, Mr. President, and I confess there is much force in it, then what we are doing by this section is, first, to provide that under certain terms and conditions things can be done which are now condemned by the Sherman Act and, second, we are repealing the criminal clause of the Sherman Act. It seems to me that is just where we are left.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Let me follow that just a moment if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with that. The Senator from Missouri must not understand me as saying that I think all these things are covered by the antitrust law; but when you take the last clause in the first paragraph of section 8, "where the effect of such acquisition," and so forth, "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce," of course that is covered by the Sherman law. Likewise with regard to the last clause of the paragraph which covers the holding company, "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce." Those two things are covered by the Sherman law.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I am quite in accord with that idea, and I think likewise that the first paragraph of section 8 might very properly be amended by excising the words "eliminate or," because if one corporation acquires stock in another corporation and thereby eliminates competition between them I have no doubt that such a transaction would fall within the condemnation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not quite agree with the Senator from Montana. Suppose there were a hundred corporations engaged in a certain kind of business scattered all over the United States. I do not believe it would be a violation of the antitrust law for one corporation of the hundred to sell out to another. There still would remain, in all probability, that full and substantial competition which the antitrust law requires. I do not think that the antitrust law condemns every lessening of competition; otherwise it would have to be construed to mean that one concern could not under any circumstances buy or absorb another. I think it depends on circumstances whether such a transaction can lawfully occur or not.

Mr. WALSH. That, of course, is qualified by the clause where the effect is to "substantially lessen competition."

Mr. CUMMINS. It would lessen competition as between the two, but, of course, if one had a right under the law to buy out the other it could not be any offense against the law, as it is now, for one to acquire the control of the other. It is just that case that we want, as I think, to prohibit, so that if a consolidation can lawfully occur under the antitrust law it shall be an open, public consolidation, so that everybody can know what is transpiring.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, an open and public consolidation does not help us a bit. We want to stop trusts and monopolies. We must not undertake to do it by publicity. The monopolist to-day does not hide his light under a bushel. He does not proceed in secret. He comes boldly to the front. He creates his monopoly and declares that he has a monopoly, and sells his stock on the strength of it. That is, in effect, true. The statement may seem a little exaggerated; but take the Steel Trust. Did they conceal at all the fact that they were undertaking to create a gigantic monopoly?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not understand the Senator from Missouri. He certainly is not directing those remarks to anything I said.

Mr. REED. I was directing them to the last remark of the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator from Missouri certainly does not believe that the antitrust law forbids, under all circumstances, one business man from buying the business of another. That can not be true.

Mr. REED. No; but I undertake to say that the law ought to be that one corporation can not acquire the stock of another corporation and thus remove the competition between the two institutions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with that. That ought to be our policy. But suppose there are a dozen drug stores in the city of Washington, does the Senator from Missouri believe, assuming that they affect interstate commerce, that one of the stores could not be bought by the proprietor of another unless the transaction is accomplished with a practical destruction of competition in the community in which they do business?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to give the Senator a case that occurred in my State. We had a great independent manufacturer of tobacco. He made a great deal of money. He had fought the trust for years. About a year ago he died. He made a valuable brand of tobacco. The executor of the will is trying to dispose of the plant. There is an estate worth perhaps $250,000 or $300,000, it may be $500,000. He can not sell it at all because the great corporations, such as the Liggett & Myers Co. and the American Tobacco Co., say we can not buy you out, and there is absolutely perhaps $500,000 worth of property belonging to the children which can not be sold. Why should they not be able to buy this property?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that is the proper construction of the antitrust law; otherwise there could be no sale of business. I think there can be, but wherever the law permits the sale of the business then it ought to be open and public, and a corporation ought not to acquire control of a business simply through the purchase of the stock of a company which continues under its own name and, so far as the public knows, is independent in its management. That is what I think this section is inteded in the main to prevent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say this final word and then, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to have the section voted upon.

I do not propose to go back and discuss the merits of the section. We would get into every kind of controversy and there would be every sort of new argument. The purpose of the section is to strengthen the antitrust act. It seems we have gone so short a distance that it is a debatable proposition whether we have added anything to the antitrust act. Under those circumstances I insist that the criminal penalty ought to be attached at this time, and that we should not deal with subjects so closely allied to the antitrust act that they may be within it and not attach the same penalties that are provided in the antitrust act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am opposed to the proposition of the committee to strike out the penal clauses of the section. I do agree, however, very largely with what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said, that if the offense denounced in the section is made criminal it ought also to be made definite and certain. I think the amendment which the Senator from Iowa has submitted improves the section in that regard, but his amendment, as well as the section in the bill, contain a number of exceptions to the proposed rule prohibiting corporate ownership of stock of competing corporations. I do not think there is any necessity for exceptions. So far as ownership of stock is concerned in the corporation—leaving out of consideration for the time being the proposition which is spoken of by the Senator from Iowa of the acquirement of the property itself and confining our consideration to the evil of the multiplication of the corporations under one head and control—I believe that the prohibition of the corporate ownership of stock in competing corporations ought to be absolute and without exception.

I do not see any occasion for excepting common carriers; in fact, one of the most common abuses of monopoly, by means of corporate ownership of stock of competitors, is in the railroad business. The very Northern Securities case, to which the Senator from Iowa referred, is an illustration of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I shall do so. The proposition here, as I undertook to say before, is an entirely different one from the rule laid down by the court under the Sherman Antitrust Act. Here it is proposed to specify a certain definite transaction and prohibit it, namely, the corporate ownership of stock in a competing corporation or the holding of stock in two competing corporations by a holding company. The Sherman Antitrust Act simply prohibits an unreasonable restraint of trade, which is a much more indefinite and vague proposition. Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The reason that my amendment excepts common carriers is that I think that any regulation of this subject affecting common carriers ought to be made a part of the next bill, which we shall shortly, I suppose, consider. It ought to be made an amendment of the interstate-commerce law in order to preserve continuity and opportunity for thorough familiarity with the law.

I agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] that there ought to be a regulation applying to common carriers; but I have an amendment of a similar nature, although not exactly like this, which I intend to offer when the interstate-commerce law comes before the Senate for amendment; and it will come before many days, I assume.

With regard to the exception as to a company not engaged in commerce holding stock of two or more corporations for investment, the case intended to be covered and taken care of by that exception is this: Insurance companies find it very difficult to invest their money profitably, and in some States they are permitted to own the stock of corporations. There are a great many insurance companies which now own stock in many corporations. Likewise the savings banks of the country are permitted in some quarters to own capital stock. It would be, I think, unfortunate if we were to deny the savings banks and insurance companies and like investment companies the privilege of owning stock in two or more corporations, provided, of course, that they do not acquire it or hold it for the purpose of controlling the corporations or of destroying their independence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there are ample opportunities for investment and an ample number of corporations issuing securities to afford sufficient investment for the savings banks and insurance companies without modifying and weakening this prohibition of the corporate ownership of competing corporations. It is not necessary to allow savings banks and the other institutions to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has referred to own the stock of two or more competing corporations. Under this provision they may own all of the stock—we are not specifying the percentages of the stock which they may own. Under the Senator's exception they might own all of the capital stock of two competing corporations. To go into the vague and uncertain field of their intention and purpose, to ascertain whether they invested in it for the purpose of controlling the business, would be to render the whole act uncertain, with possibilities of entire evasion of its object, and to make possible every evil which it is intended to prevent.

Mr. President, after the amendment of the Senator from Iowa has been disposed of, I propose to submit an amendment which is very simple, as a substitute for section 8, simply providing that no corporation engaged in interstate commerce shall own the stock of a competing corporation likewise engaged in commerce, and that no corporation shall own the stock of two other corporations competing with each other in interstate commerce.

I fail to see any necessity for any exception or provisos attached to that proposition; and if there are no provisos, it is capable of easy enforcement. Any man or corporation who violates it knows exactly what they are doing; and it would be perfectly feasible and proper and reasonable to attach a penal clause to the section and punish by imprisonment the man who violates it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will inquire of the Senator precisely what application his proposed amendment has to the investment of savings-bank funds. That is a pretty important matter, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has called attention to it. Take the savings banks of New England, and the hundreds of millions of dollars upon which they are obligated to pay 4 per cent interest; I think we ought to be careful not to narrow the field of their investment. I do not exactly understand whether or not the Senator's amendment does so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amendment which I intend to propose would not, in my opinion, injure the savings banks in any way whatsoever. The only effect upon their investments would be that it would prohibit a savings bank from acquiring or holding or owning the stock of two competing corporations. It might own the stock of all other corporations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Take, for instance, two railroad corporations. If a savings bank should invest in the New York Central and the Southern Pacific, we will say, that would not come under the inhibition of the amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. A savings bank could invest in Pennsylvania Railroad stock and invest in the stock of every other railroad except one competing with the Pennsylvania Railroad or two competing with each other. The same rule applies to other stocks, and it seems to me that that affords an ample field of investment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree to that, and I see no possible objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before we vote upon the motion of the committee to strike out the penal clause of the section, I will read the substitute which I intend to propose in lieu of that section as it now stands:

SEC. 8. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall own, hold, or acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the shares of capital stock of a competing corporation engaged also in commerce.

No corporation shall own, hold, or acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock of two or more corporations engaged in commerce in competition with each other.

A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

I only desire to add that I fail to see a sufficient reason for excluding common carriers from the provisions of this bill merely because there are other bills pending dealing with them. The bill in most of its other features deals with railroad companies; they are not excepted from its general provisions, and there is no reason why we should complicate the situation by dissecting out of this bill, which is intended to prevent the formation of monopolies, one class of corporations which have been the favorite subjects and agents of monopoly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I raise the question of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Hollis	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Hughes	Owen	Sterling
Bryan	Johnson	Perkins	Swanson
Burton	Jones	Poindexter	Thomas
Camden	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Walsh
Culberson	Lewis	Shafroth	West
Cummins	McCumber	Sheppard	White
Dillingham	McLean	Shields	Williams
Fall	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment, on page 10, proposed by the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall consume but a moment of the time of the Senate in discussing this matter, but I believe that if we are to prevent combinations in restraint of trade and eliminate trusts from the economy of this Government we have got to enact criminal statutes, and visit penalties sufficiently severe to make it unprofitable for the violators of the law. I believe that in cases of that character—

> The fear o' hell 's a hangman's whip
> To haud the wretch in order.

I can see no possible harm that is going to result to the American people from the punishment of men for the violation of this economic principle and very proper and necessary law. If we are not going to do that we might just as well have nothing. There is no twilight zone in the realm of morality. Men know when they are doing wrong. They know when they are violating the law, and when they deliberately violate the law they ought to be punished for it. If the trusts were writing this bill they would not oppose the committee's amendment.

I am very heartily in favor of the penalty which was prescribed by the House of Representatives in this bill, and I shall vote against striking it out.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to the fact that I fear there has been an error, either of my own, unintentionally, or of the RECORD, on page 15574. The RECORD discloses a vote of mine, being a vote "yea," upon a motion made to strike out a section prescribing a criminal penalty. I had previously voted for the insertion of the very same section, and if I did vote "yea" it was certainly not intentional. I am inclined to think that in the confusion possibly the recording clerk recorded me erroneously.

My comrade here, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], tells me that I voted in the manner in which I am recorded. If so, it was an inadvertence, and I should like to have it changed unless it is too late.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the form of this motion, as I understand, is such that a vote "yea" would be a vote to strike out the penal clause; a vote "nay" would be a vote to retain the penal clause. Those who want these practices prohibited without any penalty will vote "yea," and those who want a penalty will vote "nay."

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wish to say, in voting for the committee amendment, that this prohibition is one against conduct that eliminates or substantially lessens competition between the corporation whose stock is acquired and the corporation making the acquisition. It is not a definite and specific act that is named in such a way that I think punishment by a criminal process ought to follow. It seems to me that when there is sufficient room for doubt as to what is and what is not a violation of the law, the fairest course to pursue is by legal procedure to ascertain and enjoin the violation.

That was the view of the majority of the Judiciary Committee, and that was why we thought it was harsh to proceed by criminal statute to punish on conviction when the act itself was not one absolutely specific, and where there was a line of violation and nonviolation open for investigation and consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is this law a particle more indefinite in any respect than the term "restraint of trade, or monopoly," was at the time the Sherman Act was passed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not sure that it is; and I also know that for a long time nothing was accomplished along the line of criminal procedure under the Sherman Act. I believe the better plan is, as to this act, which moves on to new lines of prohibition, at least for the present to proceed against them in the civil courts, rather than to undertake to do so in the criminal courts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are engaged in making a law, and we ought to make it sufficiently certain to enable those who must come in contact with the law to know when they are within its inhibitions and when they are not. It is an indefensible thing to make a law which is so indefinite and so uncertain that no one shall know he has violated it until he has an injunction served upon him to prevent his going further in the direction in which he was going.

We have had some experience for the last 10 or 12 years with these matters, and my view is that if we have not made the bill sufficiently definite and certain for business to know when it is violating the law, we ought to turn our attention to making it certain, and we ought to have it so absolutely certain that the man who violates it may be justly punished.

I would rather spend my time during the next few days in trying to make this section sufficiently specific to advise the business world, so that, as the President said, they may know with certainty what they may do, and then punish them if they do not obey the law, than to pass an ambiguous, uncertain proposition concerning which they know nothing, and which they will disregard if there is no punishment attached thereto.

We owe it to the business men of this country to make the law sufficiently clear to inform them of what is expected, and we owe it to the public to punish those who violate the law. I am in favor of holding the penal clause, and then I will cooperate with those who think it indefinite to make it definite.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, and its transfer to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I announce my general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. In his absence I withhold my vote. I desire to be counted to make a quorum.

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Unless I can get a transfer, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Maryland was called). The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has been called from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Being unable to secure a transfer, I must withhold my vote, but I shall request to be counted as present to constitute a quorum. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PITTMAN. The junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent on account of sickness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. MYERS. Has the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with him. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. I am informed that my pair, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], if present, would vote as I would vote. Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been relieved from my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and therefore will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is not in the Chamber. Having a pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE];

The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to know whether a quorum has voted?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not desire to be technical, but it seems to me the declaration ought to be made by the Chair, and then, if a Senator wishes to vote, notwithstanding his pair, he might do so.

Mr. OWEN. I have the right, under my arrangement, to vote in case it is necessary to make a quorum; and I wish to exercise that right if it is necessary to make a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that it is not necessary.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to say that the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If he were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 22, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call attention to the amendment proposed by the committee on page 17, which was passed over at the request of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, the committee proposes to strike out all of lines 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, which read as follows:

That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $100 a day for each day of the continuance of such violation, or by imprisonment for such period as the court may designate, not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, may I ask on what page that is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Page 17. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. LANE. What page is it, please?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Page 17.

Mr. WALSH obtained the floor.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. LANE. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. I did not desire to address myself particularly to this motion, but before we pass section 8, while it is in mind, I desire to say that at the proper time I shall myself, on my own account and not for the committee, unless the committee shall later conclude to coincide with me in my views, move a number of amendments to section 8. I shall ask to take out the words "eliminate or," in line 17, as, to say the least, being entirely unnecessary, because if competition is entirely eliminated it must, of course, be substantially lessened. Likewise I shall move to strike out the words, in lines 19 and 20, "or to create a monopoly in any line of commerce," and that for the reason that if one corporation acquires the stock of another corporation, and the effect is to create a monopoly, it is already made punishable by the Sherman Antitrust Act. I can not quite understand why the language should ever have found a place in the bill. I read section 2 of the Sherman Act:

Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

That is, everybody who attempts to set up a monopoly in any manner or by any other means—and this would be one means. The same provision is found in the next clause:

Or granting of proxies, or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other shares capital is so acquired, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Of course, if by virtue of a holding company a monopoly is created, it is punishable by section 2 of the Sherman law.

In this connection I desire to say also that, in order to quiet an apprehension which seems to exist in the minds of some lest some provisions of this act should operate to repeal or to amend the Sherman Antitrust Act, I shall offer an amendment which I have prepared to offer for the committee at the close of the bill, which is to the effect and substance that nothing contained in this act shall be deemed either to repeal or to amend or modify the Sherman Act, except as it is herein specifically stated. For instance, in section 7 it is specifically stated the Sherman Antitrust Act shall not extend to labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations.

I make these suggestions now for the consideration of members of the committee. I am inclined to think that they ought to be adopted. My own view as to the second clause, ending with the word "commerce," in line 23—

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce.—

That is to say, the holding company—is that many industrial corporations have no purpose except to establish a monopoly. Of course, the legitimate cases will be taken care of by the next paragraph, which provides that—

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same, by voting or otherwise, to bring about, or attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

I trust these matters will have the earnest consideration of my colleagues and possibly the indorsement of the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. Before this matter is passed I wish to call the attention of the Senate to page 10, line 20, that the word "heretofore" should be inserted between the words "anything" and "prohibited." The amendment reads:

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything prohibited and made illegal by the antitrust laws.

This statute we are passing is an antitrust law. Therefore it would be a sort of legislative cancellation process or legislating in a circle if we did not insert the word "heretofore." We mean to say that nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited and made illegal by the antitrust laws. Of course, in so far as this makes anything illegal we mean to have it illegal. I will ask unanimous consent that the word "heretofore" may be inserted in line 20, page 10, before the word "prohibited." That is clearly what it means. We do not mean to say that notwithstanding we pass a law it shall not have any effect. The law we are now passing is an antitrust law and we do not mean to say that it shall not have any effect. The word "heretofore" should clearly be inserted, and I hope it will be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to it. I think we ought to open the whole thing to amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent that the word "heretofore" may be inserted.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment has been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the vote heretofore taken will be reconsidered.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. WALSH. I think the committee had agreed, in line 20, on page 10, to change the word "and" to "or."

Mr. CULBERSON. The pending amendment is on page 17.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is on page 17.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the motion just voted on was to strike out the penal clause of section 8. Has section 8 been adopted as amended? Is it not still open to amendment?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is my understanding that section 8 has not yet been adopted, but the committee amendments to section 8 have been adopted, and with the understanding that amendments of individual Senators shall be considered when the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Following all the committee amendments.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was raising the question so that the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] might be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been the invariable rule, and it was so ordered in this case, that the amendments of the committee should be first considered. After they have been disposed of other amendments will be in order.

Mr. SHIELDS. My only inquiry was with a view of considering the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, which seemed to be obviously necessary to perfect the section. However, I have no objection to its going over.

Now, referring to section 9, the objection to the penal clause of section 9, which is the section which prohibits interlocking directorates in corporations engaged in interstate commerce, seems to be largely on account of comparatively small corporations engaged in trade and manufacture. As now written, the section does not apply to corporations with a capital stock of less than $1,000,000. In order to remove that objection as far as possible to this penal clause, if it is now in order to perfect the section, I move to amend the section, on page 15, line 25, by striking out "1" and inserting "5," so as to make it read "$5,000,000."

The object of this whole section, Mr. President, is to prevent the common and well-known evil of interlocking directorates, and thus a practical combination of different corporations engaged in commerce, which inevitably results in restraint of trade and monopoly. This question has been elaborately discussed on several days of this week. I have said all about the evil that I desire to say, and believing that this amendment will or ought to remove the objections of most Senators to it, and all real objections to it, and thus leave the statute in a situation to prevent the great monopolies which the legislation is really intended to prevent, I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment I have offered and then allow the penal clause to remain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it must be and always has been the parliamentary decision that the committee amendment must first be passed upon by the Senate. Of course it is always in order to propose an amendment to an amendment of the committee, but the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee is not an amendment to the committee amendment. It is an amendment to the text of the bill, and will be in order when the committee amendments have been finally passed upon. If the committee amendment proposing to strike out the penalty should meet with the approval of the Committee of the Whole and it should be stricken out, and if subsequently the Senator from Tennessee should propose his amendment, and if it should be carried, changing the amount from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000, when the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate the Senator from Tennessee can reserve the question to be voted upon separately whether the Senate will concur in the amendment of the committee which had been adopted in Committee of the Whole by striking out the language. The Senator from Tennessee can lose no rights by the ruling of the Chair. The Chair thinks that at the present time the amendment is not in order and it will not be in order until the committee amendments have been finally disposed of.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that in a list of so-called trusts which was put in the RECORD a few days ago there are many appearing, the combined capital stock of which is not more than a million, many of them not more than two million, and I should say that at least 25 per cent of them are less than five million. For instance, the American Woodworking Machine Co., alleged to be a trust—I suppose that means that it is a combination of various constituent companies or it owns properties theretofore owned prior to its organization by different competing companies—has a capital stock of $1,850,000. The American Wringer Co. has a capital stock of $1,750,000. The Chicago Railway Equipment Co. has a capital stock of $2,485,000. The Continental Cotton Oil Co. has a capital stock of $3,250,000. That is the combined capital of all.

It does seem to me that if you make this provision in relation to interlocking directorates apply only to corporations having a capital stock of upwards of $5,000,000 you will reach only those great combinations that are perhaps already existing in violation of the law and will not reach the lesser corporations that are being so adjusted as that they will eventually become a constituent part of some enormous combination.

It seems to me that if the amount is to be altered in any respect it ought to be reduced, not increased. I should certainly say that there should not be interlocking directorates in any corporations having a capital stock of more than a quarter of a million. I should like very much to hear the views of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I was perfectly aware of the capital stock of the corporations referred to by the Senator from Montana. I placed the list in the RECORD myself a day or two since. In my opinion it would be better to strike out the amount, $1,000,000, and have no limit. I agree with the Senator from Montana upon that. However, there seems to be much opposition to the penal clause applying to the smaller corporations, and since the greater corporations, those of capital amounting to from five million up even to a billion are the ones that do the greatest evil, in order to get some legislation against them I was willing to exempt others. It was not because I believed there ought to be interlocking directorates in any corporation, but in an effort to get the evil reduced and prohibit it in those that are doing the greatest wrong. It was only for that reason that I made the motion.

I reserve the right, as suggested by the presiding officer, to offer an amendment when the bill is in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It may be offered in Committee of the Whole after the committee amendments have been either agreed to or disagreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just so that the RECORD will be clear as far as I am concerned, this is another proposition to strike out the penal clause. At this time we propose to solemnly prohibit corporations engaged in competition from having a common control through the same officers, the most patent, barefaced method employed by combinations, an abuse that every man in this Chamber knows exists and knows has been employed by nearly every proprietor of monopoly in the land.

The section further provides, as it came from the House, a very mild penalty of $100 a day. It is proposed to strike that out and leave nothing in its place. There is not a trust magnate on this earth and there is not one of them that has passed from this earth who would not if he were here vote to strike out the penal clause. So far as I am concerned I propose to vote to keep it in and I ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri demands the yea and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my general pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and transfer as before and vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Making the transfer heretofore announced, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH. I announce a pair between the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state that the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay" on this vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and being unable to secure a transfer I must withhold my vote unless my vote is necessary to make a quorum. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a quorum developed by the roll call thus far?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will announce the vote to the Senator. Senators can vote after that is done, if they have a right to vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After the vote has been announced Rule XII prevents a Senator from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think so.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	Cummins	Martin, Va.	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under Rule XII I can not vote after the announcement of the vote. There is a positive rule that a vote can not be changed after it has once been announced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hughes	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Jones	Owen	Sterling
Burton	Kenyon	Perkins	Swanson
Camden	Lane	Pittman	Thomas

Cummins	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Weeks
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Shields	West
Fletcher	Myers	Simmons	White
Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Ga.	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 17, to strike out from line 3 to line 8, inclusive. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, in his absence I withhold my vote, unless it be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Mr. President, I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Being unable to secure a transfer, I must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I wish also to say that I have an understanding with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania that when it is necessary to make a quorum I am at liberty to vote. If, therefore, it should develop that my vote is necessary, I request that I be recorded as voting "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to again announce the pair of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the name of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The Secretary called the name of Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under my agreement with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] I have a right to vote in order to make a quorum. Understanding that it is necessary for me to vote in order to make a quorum, I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS. In accordance with my understanding with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], I may vote to make a quorum. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bankhead	Gallinger	Perkins	Walsh

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest that we proceed with the consideration of the amendment under discussion on yesterday to section 9b, on page 17, proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on behalf of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Mr. WALSH, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, proposes an amendment to section 9b——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the amendment which the Secretary is about to read has heretofore been read and the nature of it explained to the Senate. As will be recalled, it refers to the procedure prescribed by the interstate trade commission bill, and provides that sections 8 and 9 shall be enforced by the procedure prescribed in that act. The committee, however, reached the conclusion that it would be, perhaps, inadvisable thus to refer to an act not yet in existence, the exact nature and terms of which we have no means of knowing until it has been finally disposed of by both Houses. It was accordingly deemed the part of wisdom to repeat in this bill the provisions of that bill as they were finally adopted. Therefore, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment tendered, and I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in its stead, which is substantially the same, except that instead of making the provisions of that proposed act applicable the provisions are herein set out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That course is agreed to by the committee?

Mr. WALSH. It is agreed to by the committee.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 3, on page 18, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

Whenever the commission vested with jurisdiction thereof shall have reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating any of the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of this act it shall issue and serve upon such person, partnership, or corporation a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The person, partnership, or corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint.

Upon such hearing the commission shall make and file its findings, and if the commission shall find that the person, partnership, or corporation named in the complaint is violating any of the provisions of said sections it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the offender an order requiring that within a reasonable time and in a manner to be stated in said order the offender shall cease and desist from such violations and divest itself of the stock held by it or rid itself of the directors chosen contrary to the provisions of sections 8 or 9, as the case may be. The commission may at any time set aside, in whole or in part, or modify its findings or order so entered or made. Any suit brought by any such person, partnership, or corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of a commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district of the residence of the person or of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

Persons, partnerships, or corporations filing or causing to be filed complaints before a commission shall have the right to appear and be made parties to the case and be represented before the courts by counsel, under such regulations as are now permitted in similar circumstances under the rules and practice of equity courts of the United States.

If within the time so fixed in the order of a commission the person, partnership, or corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from the violations found to exist, and divest itself of stock held or rid itself of directors chosen, in the manner ordered by the commission, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity. All the provisions of the law relating to appeals and advancement for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply in suits brought under this section: Provided, That neither the orders of a commission nor the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in anywise relieve or absolve any person or corporation from any liability under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, or for violations of any of the provisions of this act other than those contained in sections 8 and 9 thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Montana if he intends to leave in section 9b all that precedes his amendment? I call his attention to the fact that section 9b reads:

SEC. 9b. That authority to enforce compliance with the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act by the corporations, associations, partnerships, and individuals respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: In the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows:

Mr. WALSH. It will be necessary, of course, to strike out "two" and "four." That will be done immediately upon the adoption of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. REED. Now, does the Senator mean by this amendment to exclude the right of a court in any way to interfere to enforce this section? I call attention to this: We declare certain things here to be unlawful. Having declared them to be unlawful, if we stopped at that point, the authority to enforce them would be in some court in some way, by an injunction or mandamus or other appropriate process; but if we provide, as we do here, that a thing is wrongful and follow that with a provision that the authority to enforce it is vested in a certain board, it seems to me that would be an exclusive authority that no court could interfere with until that authority had first acted. I want to know if that is the case?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I remind the Senator from Missouri that section 14 by an amendment expressly provides that aggrieved parties may proceed to secure relief by injunction for violations of the provisions under sections 2, 4, 8, and 9. That will be changed to meet the bill as passed of course, but it will still include sections 8 and 9.

Mr. REED. With that provision in the bill it is all right so far as that is concerned.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator remembers the amendment?

Mr. REED. I remember it now. I understand the Senator from Montana, then, will propose, as soon as the amendment he has offered is acted upon, to change the preceding language of the section?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. REED. I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment just adopted provides for the enforcement of sections 8 and 9; indeed, it covers sections 2, 4, 8, and 9, but I shall offer an amendment to take out sections 2 and 4. The amendment refers to those sections which appear in the bill numbered 8 and 9, but sections 2 and 3 having been stricken out, the subsequent sections of the bill will, I assume, be renumbered. I inquire of the Chair whether, if the language of the amendment is inappropriate, it may be changed to conform to the numbering when the renumbering is done?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. WALSH. Or whether the numbers themselves will be changed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the amendment will take effect as it now reads, but that if the Senator asks for unanimous consent, the numbers will be changed to correspond to the evident intention of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was the intention, Mr. President, of course, when we finish the bill to number the sections consecutively.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon the completion of the bill the numbers "8" and "9" in the amendment just adopted shall be changed so as to designate those sections now numbered in the bill 8 and 9.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Changed to whatever the new numbers may be.

Mr. WALSH. To whatever the new numbers may be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment just adopted provides for the enforcement of section 8. Section 8 has not yet been adopted. While we have adopted the committee amendments to it, notices have been given here that substitutes will be offered. I take it that if a substitute should be adopted the section might be enforced by an entirely different method than that proposed here.

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly. If the penal provision, for instance, should be adopted, I should naturally think that it would be the logical course for the Senate to eliminate section 9b altogether.

Mr. JONES. Of course we could reconsider the vote whereby the amendment has been agreed to; but I merely want to suggest that situation and ask the Senator if he does not think it would be better to withhold the amendment until section 8 is finally disposed of?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not, Mr. President, because, according to the rule under which we are proceeding, we will not be able to take up amendments offered by the Senators from the floor until the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it simply illustrates the inadvisability of considering a bill as we have been considering this one; that is, to consider committee amendments before any other amendments can be offered. While that rule may be all right with reference to appropriation bills, I think that it is a rule that we ought not to follow hereafter in connection with other measures.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that, going back a little way in our parliamentary procedure, when we agreed to consider committee amendments first we had in mind committee amendments reported by the committee and not amendments offered by individual Senators upon the floor, stating they were committee amendments.

Mr. JONES. The point I had in mind is this: For instance, in section 8 there were several committee amendments adopted, but notice has been given that substitutes will be offered for the whole section.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me it would be much better to act upon the committee amendments to a section and then upon any other amendments that a Senator may propose before we pass on to another section.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite concur in that view.

Mr. JONES. I simply suggest that with a view hereafter of not consenting to the consideration of a bill in the manner in which we have been going along with this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on the adoption of the committee amendment, being section 9b, as amended.

Mr. WALSH. I move now that the words "two, four," be stricken from the section, on page 17, line 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 23, after the word "sections," it is proposed to strike out the words "two, four," and the comma after "four."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee, being section 9b, as amended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to call attention to the fact that the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana for the language of section 9b as originally reported by the committee does not contain the penalty provision reported by the committee in the first instance. For instance, the bill as reported by the committee contained the language:

> Disobedience to any order or decree which may be made in any such proceeding or any injunction or other process issued therein shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 a day during the continuance of such disobedience—

And so forth. That is taken out. That does not appear in the proposition just adopted. Indeed, as I understand, there is now no penalty anywhere for any violation of this law we are enacting, except as to section 4.

I have made my protests upon these matters, and I do not intend to take the time of the Senator further than to say that I think we have made a great and a fundamental error. I shall continue to entertain that opinion until time shall demonstrate its incorrectness.

I repeat what I have already said: There is not a trust magnate nor a trust attorney in the United States who has not been clamoring that the penalties of the criminal laws should not be laid upon him, who has not been insisting that the penalties of every character should be made light; and we have dealt with them here in so generous a manner, so kindly and so considerately, that it seems to me they ought to give us a vote of thanks.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire that the matter shall be entirely understood, and to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri, as well as the Senate, to the fact that the penalties in relation to which he has just spoken are quite different from those in relation to which he has heretofore addressed the Senate. They are not of the same character at all.

The amendment was offered, as I stated, to make the proceedings to enforce sections 8 and 9 before the trade commission exactly the same as the proceedings before that commission to enforce any order that it may make under the provisions of section 5 of the trade-commission bill. That section provides that the commission may make the order. If it is disobeyed, the commission goes before the court and procures an order requiring compliance with the order of the commission. There are no penalties attached to that at all; but the general law takes hold of it, and there is a penalty prescribed by the general law for the violation of any injunction issued by a Federal court. So, Mr. President, it is not necessary to add penalties; but, so far as I myself am concerned, I am perfectly willing to add to this provision of the bill a penalty other than and different from that prescribed by the general law in relation to contempt of any order of a Federal court. I must confess, however, that I do not see the need of it.

Whenever an order is thus made—not by the commission, for the penalties do not refer to the order of the commission, they refer to the order of the court—whenever an order is made by the court the court has unlimited power to enforce obedience thereto. The statute offers no restriction or limitation whatever. The man against whom the order goes may be imprisoned for the term of his natural life until he does comply with the order of the court. That is to say, the executive power of the court is something different from its punitive power. Not only has the court unlimited power to wield its executive force to compel obedience, but the statute authorizes the court, even though obedience is afterwards given, to impose a penalty for contempt of the order of the court.

So I feel quite sure that my friend the Senator from Missouri, on reflection, will feel that these penalties do not stand upon the same footing. However, I feel this way about it: That whenever the order is made by the court it will be obeyed, and that there never will arise a case in which it shall become necessary to appeal to the contempt provision and to the provision prescribing penalties for disobedience; but if the Senator from Missouri cares to add to the bill a provision substantially like this, speaking for myself, I shall not oppose it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senator from Montana and to the attention of the Senator from Missouri as well the fact that the language in the section as it was originally reported by the committee is a limitation upon the court and not an extension of the power of the court. If it were not there, the court could fine the person who disobeyed the order a thousand dollars a day and imprison him for five years, whereas under the original report of the committee the fine could not exceed $100 a day and the imprisonment could not exceed one year.

I look upon it as an unnecessary curtailment of the power of the court. Instead of adding any penalty that would insure obedience to the order, we invaded the power of the court and limited the fine to $100 a day. It might be one cent per day, or it might be one minute imprisonment. I do not see in the original provision any evidence of a desire to be unusually harsh or severe with one who disobeys the order of the court.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I called attention to this striking out in connection with all the other eliminations that had been made of penal clauses; and I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that a court, under the law as it will exist when this bill is passed, has limits placed upon its power to punish for the violation of any injunction issued by the court.

In section 20 the bill provides:

> In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be * * * upon demand of the accused, by a jury—

And, following that—

> If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them as the court may direct, but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

Does not the Senator understand that that applies?

Mr. WALSH. My recollection is that that is a reenactment of the existing law. I have sent for the act, but my recollection is that the present law so limits the power of a Federal court to punish in cases of contempt.

Mr. REED. I am only addressing myself to the statement of the Senator that the power of a Federal court to punish for contempt for violating its decree is practically unlimited. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator understood me aright.

Mr. REED. This is a limit.

Mr. WALSH. No; by no means. If a district court of the United States commands one to execute a deed, he can not escape the execution of that deed by paying a fine of a thousand dollars or undergoing imprisonment for six months. The court will imprison him, as I say, for his natural life, until he executes that deed; but, in addition to that, in addition to forcing compliance with its order by imprisonment, as long as his recalcitrancy exists, this punishment may be imposed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from Montana substituted the amendment which was adopted this morning for the one he offered yesterday because the Federal trade commission referred to had not yet been established. I notice that the amendment he offered this morning sets out the specific procedure; but it still vests the jurisdiction in the Federal trade commission, and there is no such institution. I just thought I would call the Senator's attention to that, in view of the fact that he has been dealing with that general subject.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the fact had not been overlooked. We have indulged the expectation, or at least the hope, that a Federal trade commission will be created with some powers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator's expectation will be realized, but I much prefer the amendment he had on yesterday, as being simpler in form, rather than repeating in a second statute the details of procedure. If you are going to anticipate you might as well anticipate in one case as in the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment, section 9b, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. In section 10, page 21, line 11, after the word "or," the committee proposes to strike out the words "has an agent" and insert "transacts any business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also any district wherein it may be found or transacts any business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 11, page 21, after line 19, it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That in civil cases no writ of subpœna shall issue for witnesses living out of the district in which the court is held at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place of holding the same without the permission of the trial court being first had upon proper application and cause shown.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 12, page 22, line 1, after the word "that," it is proposed to strike out "whenever a corporation shall violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation, and such violation" and to insert "every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, who shall have aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, or procured such violation."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I should like to know if this will be open later to amendments offered by individual Members of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be open later.

Mr. ASHURST. It is not open at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill the reason for changing the language. Technically speaking, at least, a penal provision of law must be a provision prohibiting a certain act and prescribing a punishment. That, at least, is the technical definition of a penal law. Under the House provision, assuming that that technical definition is a limitation, there was no limintation. It read:

That whenever a corporation shall violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation, and such violation shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor—

And so forth. Now, this amendment strikes out all down to and including line 6, except the word "every" inserted at the end thereof, and inserts:

That every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, who shall have aided, abetted—

And so forth.

Now, technically, I repeat, a penal law would be a law not only prohibiting an act, but providing a punishment for the act. If the punishment is already provided for, and limited only to those cases where it is provided for, I am at a loss, without any further light upon the subject, to understand why the change has been made.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not think the substance of the section is changed by the amendment; but it was thought by the committee that the language employed by the committee was more direct. Instead of visiting on the officers the guilt of the corporation by the use of the word "deemed," the language in the amendment was proposed so that it would read:

That every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws—

That is, any corporation which shall do that—who shall—

Referring to the director, officer, or agent—have aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, or procured such violation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

This is the personal-guilt section of the bill. The committee thought that the language employed by the amendment was the more direct way of reaching the same result as that contemplated by the House provision.

Mr. CLAPP. That may be as to the officers, directors, agents, and so forth, but what I am inquiring about is, why insert the word "penal"? Why not let it read as the House had it:

Every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws.

Mr. CULBERSON. This is a criminal statute, and it only affects acts of a penal nature committed under the antitrust law of 1890 or any subsequent antitrust law.

Mr. CLAPP. That is just the trouble. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss that question. I have felt a most intense sympathy with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in his long struggle to retain some force in this law by retaining penal provisions. I have not felt called upon to enter into the discussion, much as my sympathy was with him, because I have felt that it would be utterly useless, after the test vote that was taken yesterday afternoon, but section by section, as we go along here, we find this bill in its real, vital features emasculated.

I think the Senator from Missouri was well justified in saying that the trust magnates of this country might well rejoice at the progress that is being made in the development of this bill. We have gone on here and have taken out these penal provisions, and then, while we have heard it asserted upon the floor of the Senate that section 12 supplies the deficiency occasioned by taking out these others, we now find—which, of course, upon consideration, would appear evident—that it does not extend the scope of this section except where already some act is made a penal act, not only by prohibition but by penalty, for I think no one will challenge the correctness of my statement that, strictly speaking, a penal statute must be a statute combining a prohibition and a penalty.

It is not for me to address any admonition to anyone here. The ranks of those to whom I could appeal on a party basis are somewhat attenuative; but it does seem to me that, after passing the trade commission law—which I very much fear will prove to fall far short of being the effective instrument which some have hoped it would—now, in taking up the House bill, we have gradually eliminated these forceful features until all that is left is one provision relating to the making of patent contracts.

As I said before, I am not going to deliver any lecture or admonition; but it strikes me that there will be sore disappointment when the American people come to learn, after all this talk of a "trust program," that we have narrowed the thing down to leaving the trust offenders to the doubtful powers of the trade commission.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has said that section 12 is the personal-guilt section; and I have heard it suggested in other parts of the discussion, as to other parts of the bill, that the personal-guilt question might be met by section 12. Now, as the Senator from Minnesota suggests—I do not know that he suggested this point, but I call it to his attention and to that of the chairman of the committee—section 12 does not apply to persons except as they may be connected with corporations.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course.

Mr. KENYON. So that section 12, if that is the personal-guilt section, does not in any way apply to individuals except as the individuals are officers or directors of corporations.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I briefly stated that in the broad statement I made that this did not broaden the penal provisions at all; but I did not state it so fully as the Senator is now stating it.

Mr. KENYON. Of course the penal provisions of the Sherman Act, sections 1 and 2, carry a penalty within themselves and are complete within themselves, and this section would add nothing to that.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Sherman Act provides the penalty where the corporation acts, and it is against the corporation. This provision penalizes the individuals who act for the corporation and is, as it has been very often termed, the personal-guilt portion of this bill.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator does not claim that section 1 of the Sherman Act does not penalize the individual?

Mr. CULBERSON. What I mean to say is this: Heretofore, under the Sherman Act, if a corporation were guilty of a violation of that act, the guilt of that corporation would not be visited upon the individual director or agent or officer who authorized or committed or induced the act. This section is intended to supply that deficiency and to visit upon the officers and agents of the corporation responsible for the conduct punishment for the act of the corporation.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is a good purpose, if it is carried out.

I only want to say just a word, Mr. President. I feel, with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], that we are gradually dropping out the teeth of this measure. I want to vote for this measure, if it will do any good; but if, when we come to the conclusion of it, criminal section after criminal section or portion thereof is left out, I shall hesitate very much to vote for it.

I have a very great admiration for the hopeless fight that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] seems to have been making. I have always believed that guilt should be personal; that the fining of corporations is nothing but a farce, as that fine is merely transferred to the consumer; but jail sentences are not farces, and jail sentences can not be transferred to the banks of the consumers.

Fines accomplish nothing. I have heard it said that criminal penalties made impossible the enforcement of the Sherman Act; that if we had a mere jail sentence without fine, which I have always favored, it would be impossible to convict. Mr. President, I believe it would be a good deal better if in this bill we got rid of the fines and if in the Sherman Act we got rid of the fines.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator in this connection if he does not think the fear of conviction and imprisonment would be a great deterrent of a violation of the law?

Mr. KENYON. There is no doubt about it. It has not been much of a deterrent if we could assume there had been any fear, for I think there has been little fear in the past, though the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] suggested that there had been no trusts formed under this administration at all, which may perhaps be because of the fear to which the Senator refers.

Mr. JONES. Of course heretofore they escaped punishment by a jail sentence, even though they might be convicted. They might be fined, and that would be the end of it.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; the fine is an absolute farce.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. If the sole penalty was a jail sentence, might there not be a great fear entertained by the Department of Justice that somebody would have to go to jail in the event of a prosecution, and therefore there might be no prosecution?

Mr. KENYON. That may find some basis in the mind of the Senator. Certainly he would not suggest it as to the present administration.

Mr. POMERENE. I am in entire sympathy with the view of the Senator from Iowa that a lot of these malfeasants ought to have been sent not to jail but to the penitentiary, and I think if that had been done in the earlier history of the Sherman law we would not have any trust question now to deal with.

Mr. KENYON. I know the Senator's view along that line, and it rather surprised me when he voted against the amendments of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. POMERENE. I did vote against several of those amendments because of this fact: The sections to which the penal provisions were added were rather indefinite and left the matter so largely to an administrative board that I doubted the wisdom of attaching a penalty to the statute in the form in which it is here. If it had been made specific, if it could have been made clear as to just what holding of stock might interfere substantially with competition, I should have felt differently about the penalty clauses.

Mr. KENYON. I remember the Senator was very earnest in his endeavor soon after entering the Senate to have the Standard Oil Co. prosecuted criminally for a violation of the Sherman Act, which Sherman Act, it seems to me, is just as uncertain as are the provisions of these other acts.

I rose, however——

Mr. POMERENE. I can not agree with the Senator on that phase of the question. It does seem to me that the provisions of the Sherman law are entirely clear, as clear as any statute can be made applied to the multifarious affairs of mankind. I do not think that these are so clear that there ought to be a penal feature attached.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to me they are fully as clear if not clearer than those provisions of the Sherman Act.

But I rose merely to say in explanation of whatever vote I may cast that I feel discouraged at the vote which has been cast on the various amendments of the committee striking out the criminal features of many of the sections. Party platforms have been declaring for years, as the Senator from Missouri says, and as most of us talked on the stump, of making guilt personal. Now, we have a chance to help do it. I do not believe we ought to handle the trusts or any of the elements entering into the trusts lightly or by a mere slap-on-the-wrist policy. It is not easy to convict them. Everybody knows that. But to-day there are convictions under the Sherman Act. Officers and directors of the Cash Register Co., for instance, have been convicted and a jail sentence imposed upon them, and that kind of business has more to do with restraining the formation of trusts and monopoly than anything else which could be done.

I shall vote all through the bill to retain the criminal features of the bill, and I hope it will be in such shape at its conclusion that something will be left in the bill to justify a vote for it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, this has been largely a lawyers' discussion, and yet the evil that comes from these vast organizations is not confined to lawyers. There are a good many lawyers, but there are a good many other people besides lawyers, who have seen the evil of this trust system. It is a fact, as we all know and it has been reiterated here many times, that my own Commonwealth has been the birthplace, the spawning pool, I may say, of trust organizations, and they have acquired fabulous riches in the main. Many of them live in my own midst. We saw the evil of it; and I have said while they spend money lavishly yet the great moral evil that is done through the acquisition of wealth and the methods of these gigantic trusts has been appealing to everybody who came into any contact with them.

I felt gratified when the opportunity came to me that I might have some little voice, and I will say just what I felt. I damned them a thousand times, and I have ached for an opportunity when I might in a tangible way vote to visit some real tangible punishment on them. I have sat here with the greatest discomfort, and I have voted with the greatest relish "nay," when many of my own good friends and my own colleague have voted "yea" to perpetuate this system, and it has been sad to me. I say the people of my Commonwealth, the people of this broad land, will not hold this body guiltless for simply salving over the sins of these corporations, with no penal provision, with no penalty that is tangible.

I do not think it is extravagant to say that I have heard the President of the United States a hundred times, when I have been stumping with him in our own little Commonwealth and at other times, say in most vociferous tones, "We want to establish personal guilt." I want to place these men behind the bars. It seems to me that is the only way punishment can be visited on them. As has been said, to visit a fine on the Standard Oil, what does it amount to? A quarter of a cent a gallon or less will outdo the fine a thousand times, and the poor seamstress sitting in yonder cottage sewing by the glimmer of a lamp pays the fine as she stitches her life away.

What is true of the Standard Oil is true of every other interest that is controlled by these great corporations.

I believe it would be the mistake of our day, the mistake of the Senate, and it will prove disastrous to public sentiment and disastrous to those who vote to perpetuate this sin and wrong. I shall vote for punishment for these men. I have no animus in my heart to punish a man simply for the sake of punishing him. I want that fairness and justice may be done. I want that these men henceforth shall see the way and steer clear of the evils if they do not want to be punished. If they do not want to be punished, all they have to do is to obey the law, and they will go as free as the free air of the universe.

I will vote for establishing the personal guilt and for the personal punishment of these men as I would vote for the punishment of a murderer. They have done the greatest possible wrong. They have dragged the ermine of the courts in the mire. They have fattened and grown rich on the tears, the miseries, and the sorrows of thousands of men and women. Oh, I plead, Senators, let this be the day of exterminating them. Let this be the day when we shall write in our laws and in the history of this country that the evil has passed from and beyond us henceforth forevermore.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I voted for the retention of the penal provisions of the bill not only because I am strongly in favor of such provisions for the many reasons given by those who have expressed themselves, but I also did it in the hope that if we retained them in the bill it would lead us to go on and make the provisions of various sections more definite and certain. For instance, I think that section 8 is almost meaningless, or if it does mean anything, that it impairs the efficiency of the Sherman law. So I was in hopes that if we could retain that penal provision the Senate would proceed to make that section clear and definite and make it mean something and make it accomplish something.

Personally I would like to see in these penalty provisions the word "or" stricken out, so as not to leave it discretionary with the court as to the amount of the fine and as to the term of the imprisonment, but make it so that anyone who may be tempted to violate this law will know very well that if he does it he will be convicted, and convicted with a penitentiary sentence or a jail sentence.

I think, of course, there is some force in the proposition that juries will not convict under such a condition of things, but the very existence of such a provision would prevent far more violations than the cases which would escape being prosecuted and convicted.

By section 12, as I understand the House provision, they intended to make any violation of the Sherman law by a corporation if the act was ordered or abetted by any officer of a corporation a misdemeanor. It does not make any difference what provision of the law might be violated under the conditions named that would be a misdemeanor.

I understood from the Senator from Texas the idea of the committee was practically the same thing, and they used what they thought was a little better language. If that is correct, then I think the word "penal" ought to be stricken out, because that does limit it in some way different from the House provision. The House provision is, "That whenever a corporation shall violate any provisions of the antitrust laws," whether they are penal provisions or whatever provisions they may be, and the Senate committee says whenever they shall violate "any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws." There is certainly a very substantial difference between the House provision and the Senate committee provision in that respect. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in line 8 of section 12 in the committee amendment, to strike out the word "penal."

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, it is with a good deal of interest and yet with some little irritation that those of us who have been investigating these questions for five or six weeks and have heard all sides of these matters thrashed out before the committee and within the committee see Senators endeavor to put a part of the Senate, who deem it wise to look at these amendments as a whole and not at each one as an isolated case, in a position antagonistic to proper punishment to be visited upon those who violate the law. I do not want to detain the Senate for more than a moment, but I wish simply to resent any such construction as that which may have been put upon the action of the committee.

Mr. President, it is easy to denounce a trust; it is easy to defeat a trust in any court in the land, either by a criminal prosecution or by a civil prosecution, if you have a case. It is easy to enact laws that make traps that will catch a trust. But owing to the fact, sir, that our jurisdiction extends only to those who may be engaged in interstate commerce, and the further fact that we have 48 States in the Union, setting a trap to catch trusts involves two difficulties. One of them is that we may invade the rights of the States, which they would resent. The second is that we may do more mischief to the little man who must be relied upon to transact the business of the country in the place of the trust than we will do to the trust. There may be power in interlocking directorates, but there is more power in the very size of the corporation which may be transacting business. There may be power in the ownership of stock in subsidiary companies, but it is nothing like so much power as is involved in the very fact of the great size and the fine organization of the trust.

You can take one man transacting business with $10,000 of capital. He must be at a disadvantage with a man having $10,000,000 of capital. The man with $10,000,000 of capital, without violating any law, can put the other man at a disadvantage.

If I understand those who scientifically endeavor to do something against the trusts, those who intelligently look at this question in a desire to meet this great evil, they want what? Not to destroy large business in this country or stop it, but to create competition, to fix it so that there is an incentive for the little man to come in and take the field or a part of the field which is now occupied absolutely by these gigantic corporations.

Now, let me give a little illustration. There was before us the other day—or, rather, he came to see me and other members of the committee—a man who represents an independent pipe-line company, one that the Standard has no connection with whatever. It is really furnishing an outlet for the oil of the independent operators, taking it to the southern market—the operator of the pipe line. He said that this bill as it came from the House would break up his business, and he convinced me that it would. His people control a pipe line. The pipe line was built to carry or convey oil. The oil was discovered and developed, and that made a necessity for the pipe line. Without either the other would be useless. The pipe-line company is interested in the oil production. Who on earth is going to build a pipe line unless he has something to put in it? Who would build a pipe line, costing millions of dollars, running hundreds of miles from the fields in Oklahoma down to some southern port—to New Orleans or to Port Arthur—and take the chance, the long chance, of somebody drilling oil wells or gas wells to furnish him a product to transport through the pipe line from which he can make a return upon his money? Of course, the pipe line comes after the oil is discovered and after the gas has been struck. The pipe line becomes a necessity after one has gotten the oil or the gas. Here is a great field that has been occupied heretofore, at least before the Supreme Court decision, by what we have termed the Standard Oil Co. If that be an evil to correct, for which all these tears are shed, we want to get at it intelligently, not to kill it and break up the oil business and not to break up the pipe-line business, but rather let us, in an intelligent and effective way, do something to create competition, so that you and I and our children hereafter may be permitted to engage in this business and not subject to be stricken, not only by interlocking directorates and the ownership of stock, but by the very power of the organization and the very power of its unification of capital and its perfection of organization.

If we are going to create competition, we must fix it so that the little man, right in the start, will not be hampered. If a man has a pipe line and has a product from oil or gas wells to go into it, if he can not form or buy or concentrate these little companies to give him a product upon which he can rely, he can not go into business in competition with the Standard Oil Co. The Standard now has gone forward and made its organization. It has made its situation. It has it now. If you do not allow the little oil operators and the little gas companies in some kind of a way to start in and make an organization, what are you going to do?

This question has been discussed here in relation to our strike. I can take you to West Virginia, where there are a hundred little coal operators. You call them here big coal operators, but put every one of them together and they do not amount to as much in production as one single operation that I can name. I can put my hand on four or five in the United States each one of whose combined product in coal amounts to more than every operation in the Kanawha (W. Va.) field; more than all in the Paint Creek field; more than all in the Cabin Creek field; more than all in the New River field; more than all in the Fairmont field; more than all in the Pocahontas field.

Now, what are you going to do? This business is conducted in certain well-known ways. The coal business consists not alone in the production of coal. It consists in finding a market for that coal and in transporting it to that market. You have to run a coal business in a large way. You must have docks and selling agencies.

Mr. President, the little coal operator of West Virginia is charged from 10 to 15 cents just to sell his coal. The big corporation can sell its coal for about 2 cents a ton. The difference between the 2 cents that it costs the big man to sell it, because he is big and because, without violating any law, he has organized his business, gotten it together in a legal way, and the 10 cents or 15 cents that it costs any little West Virginia operator to sell his coal is a big profit, and a profit that every operator in that State would be perfectly willing to take. Is that your idea of an intelligent solution of this great question? Would you fix it so that those small operators could not get together to have a sale agency or that one of them may not buy another interest, or when he would be willing to do so, may not buy some stock in another company? They can put three or four companies together, and by combining their selling agencies they would have an organization not one-half as big as one of these great corporations, yet this might take off some of the cost of selling and handling and producing the coal. The big concern buys the property outright. The small producer is not able to do so. Let us not make an honest effort at competition impossible. Recollect that the man who is opposing these little operators is already organized by virtue of his money, his wealth, his good sense or luck in combining his business. Are you going to paralyze the hand of the little man who wants to compete with him? That is the view that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has been presenting to you here. That was the view that was presented to the Committee on the Judiciary. We are asking you here to approach this question in a sensible and intelligent way. Do not waste the time of the Senate by trying to put somebody who looks upon both sides of this question in a position of defending any trust. I would wipe out every one of them in a minute if I could, but I do not want to wipe out the business of the United States.

What I want to do is to approach this question in all its forms, realizing that it is not easy. The great minds of this country have been dealing with it and they find it difficult. They find that these questions involve State rights. I, sir, am not yet satisfied that I have a right to go down and say to a State, "You shall not incorporate a company, you shall not allow a company to be there and engage in interstate commerce that has stock issued in a certain way." I do not know but what the court will hold it to be beyond the power that is conferred upon us under the interstate-commerce law.

We have studied this question from every standpoint. Do we want to put little businesses all over this country in fear? Do we want them to stand trembling before they take a step? One man has a little coal company, with an output of, perhaps, 50,000 tons, another one of 100,000 tons, and another of 100,000 tons. That amounts to 250,000 tons. There is one corporation operating in the fields of West Virginia that produces 12,000,000 or 15,000,000 tons. He passes the cost of selling his product through 12,000,000 tons of coal. This little combination, owned by the little man who has probably come up from the mines and earned his property, has to pass the cost of selling through only 250,000 tons. The object was to curb the gigantic trust and encourage the small producer. We approached these questions with caution and with care and thought. We ought not to go out in an uncertain field and probably do greater injury to the little man than we could do in the way of correction against the big corporation.

Mr. President, the first and chief proposition that the people laid down to us and that all of us have agreed upon is that we will not touch a line or a section of the Sherman antitrust law. It must remain as it is. We had to consider certain things which have never of themselves been held to be a violation of that law, but which in connection with other things have been held to be a part of a conspiracy to violate it. We have started out upon the plan of stopping these things in their incipiency by the use of the injunction, by the use of the corrective hand of the trade commission. By this plan we can keep the trust hatchery from working in the future; but we fear that if we make all steps criminal offenses it may be construed to be, and might be to that extent, a modification of the Sherman antitrust law; and we do not want to do that. Certainly, whether it is or not, if we put in here an exception, we do not want to be, as I said this morning, engaged in that kind of legislation which might be called "legislative cancellation"; that is, to put a thing in the bill and then put in another section that shall cancel it. We want to adjust each step and try it, and by proceeding slowly let the Federal trade commission block out the way.

We want to stop interlocking directorates as far as we can. But we do not want to injure the small man in the savings bank. We do not want to injure the little coal operator or the little oil operator. We do not want to destroy or to frighten legitimate business. We do not want the little business man to come up trembling whenever he makes a contract. We are just trying to build up, if we can, a bulwark against these trusts. If the Federal trade commission shall say a thing is going too far, they can enjoin it and have the thing stopped. We do not meddle with the greater things that are already held to be under the Sherman antitrust law a crime. In that way we will proceed intelligently, having regard to all the ramifications and complications of American business. We must keep in mind that it is the little man in the end who must take care of the trusts by his own exertion and by building up a bulwark against them.

Mr. President, I am just as much an antitrust man as anyone here. I have no interest in any trust whatever, nor in anything that looks like one. I have engaged in this campaign against them, and I am proud of it. I want to wipe them all out, but I want to do it in an intelligent way, and I want the Senate to understand that we have pondered over these things prayerfully. We have done it day in and day out, trying to bring to the Senate a measure that would square with the intelligent, advanced uplift idea of meeting the greatest question before the American people. The trusts want time. Nothing gains time like litigation. The friend of reform must guard against untried expedients, and he must remember that the trust question is a condition, not a theory. Why shall we set a trap that may ensnare more legitimate than illegitimate business? The violation of the Sherman law is already a crime. This law does make crime personal. We have made the offense of a corporation also the offense of every officer aiding, abetting, or voting for the criminal act. But we can not make things crimes, punishable at once by imprisonment, which the world has long recognized as legitimate. We have made interlocking directorates illegal; holding of stock by one corporation in another illegal; but since these things have heretofore been considered proper and legal, we think it safe to administer this law through the trade commission, and where there is doubt let that commission first decide the question before business shall be punished. This law has teeth in it, all right. It will correct the evils at which it is aimed. After its passage legitimate business will take on renewed vigor. Only the dishonest corporations will stand in fear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the committee. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "penal," in the committee amendment, where it appears on page 22, line 8, before the word "provisions."

Mr. JONES. I do not know how the committee feel with reference to this amendment. I do know, however, that when Senators come in here and are told that it is an amendment offered by Senator So-and-so they seem impressed with the idea that the committee is not favorable to the amendment. I want to suggest the absence of a quorum before we reach a vote on the amendment to the amendment. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Martin, Va.	Shields
Bankhead	Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Brady	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Bryan	Johnson	Overman	Sterling
Burton	Jones	Owen	Swanson
Camden	Kenyon	Perkins	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Pittman	Thornton
Chilton	Lane	Poindexter	Vardaman
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	White
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Reed	Williams
Cummins	Lewis	Shafroth
Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. RANSDELL answered to his name when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. Under the standing order of the Senate, the Sergeant at Arms will request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. DILLINGHAM and Mr. WEST entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I want once more to emphasize the situation in which we find ourselves. One House of Congress is apparently being run by the police force and the other House is losing almost half its time in drumming up absent Members. I have no power to make it otherwise, nor has any individual Senator; but it is an imposition that we are called here each day at 11 o'clock, while two days ago at the opening we spent 50 minutes in getting a quorum, and we average from 15 to 20 minutes each morning in that way. We lose valuable time, as we have just now lost it, in hunting up Senators who are, I suppose, engaged in business that interests them.

Personally, Mr. President, I have no responsibility for the condition that exists, but the situation impresses me as one that ought to be remedied. I do not know whether I shall vote for this bill or not, but I do want the debate to end and to have the bill voted on and determined by a majority of this body. I presume I ought not to say this, but I feel it so profoundly that I can not restrain myself from once more calling attention to a situation which, I repeat, ought to be remedied in some way.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to be assumed that those of us who believe that there are some regulations of commerce that can be better enforced by civil process than through indictment and trial in a criminal court are actuated by the desire to be tender of trusts and monopolies. I assume that every Senator has the same object in view, namely, the better regulation of commerce; and I assume that he desires to maintain what competition we have and to restore some of the competition we have lost.

I am not conscious of any desire to see people in the penitentiary; that is not my principal object. There was a time when England, I think, had more than 100 offenses that were punishable by death; and I have sometimes wondered how we escaped from that system of law. The proposition now made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is directed, of course, to sections 8 and 9. If adopted it will have no other effect than to make the officers and directors of corporations which violate the provisions of sections 8 and 9 criminally liable, although the Senate has just voted that the corporations themselves shall not be criminally liable.

Section 8 is not directed wholly against trusts. We already have a statute against trusts and monopolies. Section 8 forbids a corporation purchasing the stock of another and competing corporation. In my State, small as it is commercially, I venture to say that there are hundreds of little corporations which own some stock in other little corporations. I do not believe in the policy, and I desire to end it; but the suggestion that this controls and governs the big trusts and the great corporations which those Senators who have spoken have in view is entirely a misapprehension. It is a general readjustment of the commercial policy of the United States; it is an inhibition upon a policy that has been authorized by the laws of nearly every State in the Union. I want to change that policy; I think it is for the public good that it shall be changed; but because I do not believe that a corporation which may in the future purchase the stock of another corporation which it may believe honestly not to be in competition with it should be punished criminally, I hope will not be regarded as any evidence that I am not earnest and sincere in my desire to bring to justice through the criminal courts the obvious offenders against an acknowledged policy.

I would be perfectly willing to supplement the civil processes which we have provided for with a criminal process, if the offense was defined with that clearness and certainty which we always ought to observe before we denounce a citizen as a criminal. I assert again, as I asserted this morning, that I can not bring my conscience to the position that one who might be found to be an offender under section 8 should be punished criminally. I do not understand what it covers; I would be utterly unable to apply it with anything like certainty and with anything like a feeling that I had not misapplied it. I will not vote to make a man a criminal who may exercise an honest judgment upon a complicated and intricate and somewhat involved statute until somebody is given the authority to say to him, "This transaction is one which the law forbids."

I stated yesterday that if we were to appoint a tribunal, as we have appointed a tribunal in the bill already passed, to investigate these matters I would be willing, more than willing, anxious, to attach criminal punishment to the one who having been warned, who having been ordered to discontinue a practice that has been found to be unlawful under the statute, persisted in that unlawful course. There is something fair about that; but it hardly seems to me to be fair to put upon a citizen the hazard of determining at his own risk whether a corporation with which he is connected may lawfully purchase stock in another corporation, when the test is, first, does the purchase of the stock substantially lessen competition as between the two corporations, and to put upon him the necessity of applying the test, is the purchase of the stock of a subsidiary corporation forbidden by the law an extension of or belonging to the corporation of which he is a part?

I submit, Senators, that we must preserve some fairness in dealing with the people of this country, and I therefore can not vote to attach a criminal penalty to section 8 as it now is or to section 9 as it now is. I am opposed to both those sections on the ground that neither of them furnishes a rule of conduct, neither of them furnishes a standard that can be applied with that certainty that all criminal laws ought to be applied.

Let us see if my original statement is sustained by the facts, namely, that striking out the word "penal" in the proposed amendment of the committee would affect only criminal transactions under sections 8 and 9. The antitrust law which is one of the laws to which reference is made has a penal provision. There is attached to it a punishment for every violation of the law. Section 4 has a penal provision, and very properly so; it does describe an offense, a very serious offense, and one which, unfortunately, has been altogether too prevalent, and I voted to attach a criminal penalty to it. Section 12 as it now is makes the officers and directors and the agents of a corporation responsible, criminally, for every act committed by the corporation in violation of the antitrust law; it makes them criminally responsible for every act committed in violation of section 4, and the only other prohibitions against corporate actions in this bill are the prohibitions contained in sections 8 and 9. Therefore, when the word "penal" is stricken out, we have said that for any violation by a corporation of the provisions of sections 8 and 9 we render the officers, directors, and the agents of such corporations criminally liable. It can have no other effect.

If the Senate will do, as I hope it will do before we have finished this subject, reform sections 8 and 9 so that they mean something and so that those who are interested in their construction may reasonably know what they mean, then I will vote to attach a criminal penalty; but even then I would insist upon it being made supplemental to or at least to accompany the civil remedy worked out through the commission, just as the civil remedy under the antitrust law is worked out through the courts.

These are the reasons, Mr. President, that make it impossible for me to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel impelled to say something along the line of the remarks just made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I appreciate very well that some degree of approval will be had in some quarters for those who vote for penalties in a bill of this kind for any and all violations of its terms, and I very much fear that some of my colleagues who are voting to incorporate these penalties do so rather unreflectingly.

At the common law, as has been stated here repeatedly, one corporation was not entitled to hold stock in another corporation. That was found very efficacious at the common law, although there was no penalty attached to the acquisition by one corporation of stock in another corporation. It was simply made unlawful, and no title at all to the stock was acquired by the transfer; and accordingly, at the common law, one company did not acquire stock in another company.

That rule still obtains in many of our States. It prevailed in my State until about five or six years ago, when an act was passed authorizing corporations to hold stock in other corporations. The act was roundly condemned by public sentiment in my State, and very justly so, because it was a departure from the rule of the common law when the drift of sentiment was against granting power to corporations to acquire stock in other corporations. That is to say, until five years ago no corporation in my State was entitled to hold stock in another corporation; but we did not have to affix any penalty to it. The law itself took care of it merely by the absence of a provision authorizing a corporation to hold stock in another corporation. The mere want of the power was sufficient to accomplish the entire purpose, and everybody can appreciate how it would be.

Here is a corporation that pays out $100,000 and acquires stock in another corporation, and under the law it has no power at all to hold that stock. It has no title to that stock. Any creditor of the original owner of the stock may go and levy an attachment upon it and seize it to satisfy any obligation he may have. In a contest over the election of the directors of a corporation holding stock of that character that stock can not be voted, because the corporation has no title at all to it, having no power to acquire stock.

Mr. President, if that policy never had been departed from, we would not have the difficulties that we are endeavoring to reach by this bill. Those individuals who desired to accumulate a vast number of corporations and then consolidate them into a great trust, or to have one corporation acquire the stock of half a dozen other corporations, simply incorporated under the statutes of some State, like the State of New Jersey, which tolerated that kind of thing. They did not come to Montana and organize under our law, because their organization would fall of its own weight. It would be a rope of sand that would fall to pieces.

So, Mr. President, if we did nothing more in this act than merely to declare that it should be unlawful for one corporation to acquire stock in another corporation, the two being competitors, we would probably then have a statute which would be entirely adequate to reach this evil.

Why, just think of it! Suppose we should leave our statute that way—"It shall be unlawful for one corporation to hold stock in another corporation"—how could a corporation be organized such as we seek to get at here? Do you imagine for a moment that anybody would organize a holding corporation and endeavor to put in that corporation the title to the stock of half a dozen competing corporations? He could not acquire the stock at all in the face of a statute declaring a thing of that kind unlawful, and the projectors simply would not risk their money in an enterprise of that character.

I am sorry the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] seems to have gone away. But, Mr. President, we not only do that in this statute; we not only say to every man who desires to organize a trust or a combination of this character, "You can not get any title at all to stock of that character," but we further go on and say, "If you actually do get it, you are liable to be haled before the Federal trade commission, if you are not brought to book in any other way, and have the stock taken away from you."

So we have accomplished by the provisions of this bill all that it is necessary to do in that regard without the imposition of any penalties; and in the imposition of the penalties we go further than the common law went, when upon all hands it was conceded that it was entirely efficacious to prevent the accomplishment of the wrongs which we seek to redress here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I withhold my vote, but I desire to be counted as present.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I announce my general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and withhold my vote. I wish to be recorded as present.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). If necessary to make a quorum, I have the right to vote. I withhold my vote until that is ascertained.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have the right to vote in case it is necessary to make a quorum. I will vote, and withdraw my vote if necessary. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. I inquire whether a quorum has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet.

Mr. HOLLIS. Under the terms of my pair I have a right to vote in that event. I vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to be recorded as present to constitute a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 31, as follows:

So Mr. JONES's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 10, after the word "deemed," it is proposed to insert the words "guilty of," so as to read "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and so forth.

Th amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 15, after the word "laws," the committee proposes to insert the words "including sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act."

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "two," as that section has been stricken from the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 23, after the word "issue," the committee proposes to strike out the colon and the proviso, all down to and including the words "Interstate Commerce Commission," in line 6, page 24.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the clause proposed to be stricken out was not read. I ask that it may be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to entitle any person, firm, corporation, or association, except the United States, to bring suit in equity for injunctive relief against any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, in respect of any matter subject to the regulation, supervision, or other jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my purpose in calling attention to that section was to state that later I intend to offer an amendment expressly conferring upon the several attorneys general of the States the right to bring suit to enforce this trust act and to bring it in the name of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 13, after the words "result to," the committee proposes to strike out the words "property or a property right of," so as to read:

No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the applicant—

And so forth.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am opposed to striking out the words in line 13, section 15, which are proposed to be stricken out. I would offend the proprieties and offend the intelligence of Senators if I stated the reason why. I take it that most of the Senators have studied the bill more closely than I have; but I do ask for a vote on the question of striking out those words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator request the yeas and nays?

Mr. ASHURST. I think I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask if this is an amendment proposing to strike out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is to strike out, on page 24, line 13, the words "property or a property right of." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on previous votes to-day, I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. GORE's name was called). I desire to announce a pair existing betwen the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and to have this announcement remain for the day.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as heretofore and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Being unable to get a transfer of the pair, I must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." Furthermore, I announce that if necessary to constitute a quorum I will vote "yea" anyhow.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLLIS. I vote "yea," understanding that it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I make the same announcement as heretofore as to the transfer of my pair and vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I wish to inquire whether a quorum has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. OWEN. Then I have the right to vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—36

Bankhead	Hollis	Perkins	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hughes	Pittman	Sterling
Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Swanson
Camden	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Thomas

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I hesitated about making an explanation on behalf of the committee of the reason for the taking out of this language until the yeas and nays were called for. If the Senate will pardon me for just a moment, I desire to say that section 15 deals with the subject of injunctions generally. It is provided there that no preliminary injunction shall be issued except in cases involving property and property rights. Of course, you might desire an injunction in a case not involving a property right. You might desire an injunction in a case involving a political right. You might desire an injunction to restrain the taking of a child out of the jurisdiction of the court. You might desire an injunction for many other purposes than to protect property. However, section 18 deals with controversies between employers and employees, and in that section it is provided—and the committee left that—

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator from Montana a question, I note that section 18, to which he has referred, provides for the issuance of a restraining order to prevent irreparable injury to property or to property rights. Suppose there was threatened personal violence or that actual personal violence or discomfort was in progress; was it the intention of the committee that in such a situation as I have indicated the person could not be protected against the personal violence or personal discomfort, but at the same time you protect property against irreparable injury?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we can add further to that proposition. Suppose a man desires to avail himself of the injunctive process of a court and is so unfortunate in this world as to have no property; is he to be deprived of the equity power of the court because he has no property to protect, although he may in person be molested in every conceivable way? Are the nonproperty class of our citizens, pretty large and growing larger, to be put in a class and ostracized from our courts of equity as to the injunctive relief which they are authorized to grant to those who have property?

Mr. POMERENE. The question of the Senator from Idaho is very pertinent. That one matter has caused me a great deal of trouble in trying to determine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 15, page 24, line 14, after the word "notice," strike out "could" and insert "can."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the same line, after the word "served," strike out the word "or" and insert the words "and a."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 21, after the word "fix," insert the words "unless within the time so fixed the order is extended for a like period for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 6, strike out the word "his," the first word in the line, and insert "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 7, after the word "dissolve," strike out "his" and insert "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 16, page 25, line 23, after the word "That," strike out the comma and the words "except as otherwise provided in section 14 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 17, page 26, line 11, after the word "their," at the end of the line, insert "officers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In page 26, line 13, after the word "concert," insert the words "or participating."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 18, page 27, line 4, after the word "persons," insert "whether singly or in concert."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the words "so to do" and the semicolon, strike out the words "or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on page 27 lines 7 to 10 are proposed to be stricken out. The subject comprehended in those lines has been widely discussed in the Senate. The origin was traced to the act of December 21, 1906, of the British parliamentary enactments. It would be a work of supererogation for me or any other Senator to say anything further in favor of the subject. I ask for a vote by a roll call upon the amendment striking out the words.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair, and in the absence of a transferee I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair and transfer as before, and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as previously announced, I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer, and I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and the same transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Again transferring my pair as heretofore announced, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON. I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN. I would like to ask whether a quorum has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to make a statement now in order to settle the question and to make a ruling. Rule XII provides that—

When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the presiding officer.

The Chair rules that hearing the number of votes that have been cast for or against a proposition, if the same does not constitute a quorum of the Senate, it does not constitute a decision upon the part of the Chair that the amendment has been lost or that the amendment has been carried. The Chair rules that Senators in the Chamber who have a right to vote, if the vote does not disclose a quorum, have a right to vote before the Chair decides the question. On the amendment the yeas are 32 and the nays are 15. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I vote "yea."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] having entered the Chamber and voted, I desire to withdraw my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas are 33, the nays 15, and Senators CHAMBERLAIN and JOHNSON having announced their pairs and being present in the Senate, the Chair declares the amendment carried.

The vote by yeas and nays, the result of which was announced by the Vice President, was as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bankhead	Gallinger	Owen	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Hughes	Perkins	Smoot
Bryan	Jones	Pomerene	Sterling
Camden	Kenyon	Ransdell	Swanson
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Reed	Thornton

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. In order that the subject may not be forgotten or lost sight of, I desire to say that at the proper time I intend to offer an amendment to take the place of that which has just been stricken out, and I will read it:

Or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information.

I make this announcement because Senators might think that the whole subject had been disposed of.

Mr. REED (to Mr. CUMMINS). Offer it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that I am at liberty to offer it now.

Mr. REED. I think so. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The language just voted upon having been stricken out, is it not now in order to offer other language to take its place?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not at the present time. If the amendment had been to strike out and insert, it would have been in order, but it was not so treated. The Secretary will proceed to state the committee amendments in their order.

The SECRETARY. In section 18, page 27, line 10, at the end of the line, after the word "or," strike out "of" and insert "from."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On line 12, after the word "from," strike out the words "ceasing to patronize or to employ" and insert "withholding their patronage from."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On line 15, after the word "peaceful," insert the words "and lawful."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 18, after the word "assembling," strike out the words "at any place."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 22, after the word "held," strike out the word "unlawful" and insert "to be violations of the antitrust laws."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is a great deal of objection to this change. The provisions of the section we are just now considering are aimed at the limitation of the power of injunction with reference to certain things. I do not intend to pause to argue the question as to whether the section itself is wise or unwise. I will simply say in passing that I have favored it, but those matters dealt with concern labor organizations and laboring men, and we propose to give them the unqualified right to terminate their relation of employment, to cease from work, and to recommend or advise others by peaceful means so to do.

We propose to give them the further right of "peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working," and the further right of "withholding their patronage from any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do," and the further right of "paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value," and the further right of "peaceably assembling in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

Mr. President, those are specific things we are dealing with. We are conferring a specific right and nothing else, and in order to cover the question by a general clause the House added the language limited now to the particular things which we are proposing to stipulate may be done. I quote:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

That language is properly there, because we are making the acts lawful; we are specifying the particular acts. The committee, after a good deal of debate, substituted for the word "unlawful" the words "to be violations of the antitrust laws." The words "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of the antitrust laws" seem to imply that they might be violations of some other law, although we have already declared them to be lawful.

In my opinion the bill would much better conserve the rights we have above specified if the phrase "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of the antitrust law" were left out entirely, because, as it is written, it amounts to a limitation upon the preceding words instead of an expansion or a fortification of the preceding words

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment. My desire is—and I shall vote accordingly—to retain the language as it came to us from the other House. Retained as it comes to us from the House the final clause would read:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

It would amount to a reaffirmation of the language which precedes it; it would be a general clause embracing it; and I think the bill would be better in that form.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I will not ask the Senator from Missouri a question, but I will take the floor in my own right for just one observation.

As the Senator says this clause deals with nine different acts; but it legalizes nothing, and is not intended to legalize anything. This section simply deals with the jurisdiction or power of the Federal courts. So far as I am concerned, I am not so particular about that, because, being a citizen of West Virginia, I must bring my suit in the State courts. So must all the other million and a half of people of my State. All that this provision does is to prevent, in certain specified cases, nonresidents of West Virginia from bringing suit in the Federal courts of West Virginia to enjoin certain things. I speak, of course, from my standpoint. That applies, of course, to every other State. We simply say that because of certain abuses of the right of injunction well known and often discussed, we see fit to limit that right in these nine specific instances where labor disputes may be involved.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to a statement which he made that was so general that I think when his attention is more particularly drawn to the provisions of this section he will modify the position which he has announced. The demand of labor organizations is intended to be met in this section. I say frankly that is what it is intended to be done, and it was granted, thoroughly understanding that fact; we do not want to deceive the country or the people. We felt that there have been abuses in this matter and that we ought to grant this relief. No one, however, asked us to declare that anything should be lawful unless we had power to say so. We have not any power to declare things lawful or unlawful in the States; but we have the power to deal with the jurisdiction and the practice in the Federal courts. We have the right to limit the writ of injunction in the Federal courts. We can not declare a certain act to be unlawful in a State; we can not declare an act lawful in a State.

The agitation resulted from the fear of labor organizations that they would be brought under the Sherman antitrust law or under these proposed antitrust laws, and be thereby declared illegal. This section says that that shall not be done by a Federal court. That is as far as we can go. For instance, take one of these inhibitions, No. 7, as I have numbered them. We prevent the Federal courts—from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value.

We have nothing to do with whether the labor organization would withhold such benefits rightfully or wrongfully. We simply say that the Federal courts shall not have the power to deal with that subject by injunction; but if the amendment is not agreed to and we merely leave in the word "unlawful," then we say that even though the labor organization might withhold the benefit wrongfully and the beneficiary be a nonresident, he can not sue for it in a Federal court, and no Federal court would have power to say thereafter that it had been unlawfully withheld, although it might have jurisdiction of the law case brought by the man who is entitled to the money.

Let me see if my meaning is clear. Here is a labor organization which withholds strike benefits from a nonresident citizen who would now have the right to go into the Federal court. Shall we say in this section that in a suit properly brought to recover the money no Federal court shall have the right to hold that act of the labor organization unlawful? We do not mean to say that; we do not need to go that far. We simply mean to say that labor organizations shall not be brought under the ban of the antitrust laws or of the laws of the United States. That was all that was asked and all that was contended for.

This might apply to other things. It might be that a citizen would have a right to complain because of some of the other acts mentioned here, and jurisdiction of his complaint might lie in a Federal court. That law should not be that as to any kind of litigation involving any kind of a right of any citizen in a State, even though it be conceded that the act complained of was unlawful and that it did take from a man a right, he shall not sue for it in the Federal court. The purpose of the law is not to declare that in an injunction suit or a lawsuit or in any other kind of litigation a Federal court can never hold that the act was unlawful. That would be to invade the rights of the States and to create needless and class legislation. It does seem to me that language would be going too far.

I will go as far as anybody here to break up what has been alleged to be a wrongful handling of labor disputes by Federal courts. So far as I am concerned, if I become involved in litigation growing out of a labor dispute in West Virginia, I have to go, and the other 1,500,000 people of West Virginia have to go, into the State courts. This provision will not prevent a nonresident who has a litigation with the labor people from going into the State courts of West Virginia. He can do as I have to do and as the other 1,500,000 people of West Virginia must do; that is, apply to the State courts.

I am not very particular about preserving this right for a few foreign corporations or a few foreigners who might happen to come to West Virginia; I do not think I am violating any public duty when I restrict them in this respect, recognizing, as I do, that Federal courts have in some instances gone further than the public conscience would permit them to go; but to ask me still further to say that under all circumstances the nine acts mentioned in this section shall by a Federal court be held to be lawful, no matter whose rights may be involved, that no matter how the question may arise, in suits in equity or actions at law or criminal prosecutions, they shall be in all respects lawful in the Federal jurisdiction, is not my conception of a just demand. It does seem to me that is going too far and is going further, even, than the labor people have asked us to go.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; the labor people have very distinctly asked and very urgently asked for a restoration of this language as it came from the other House. There can be no disputing that fact.

The Senator very artfully argues that if we say in this bill that the acts enumerated shall not be held to be unlawful, that would sometimes prevent the collection by somebody of a strike benefit. If he is really alarmed about that, I call his attention to his own statement that the courts of West Virginia will still be open, and nothing that we can do here will take away the right of the man entitled to $4 a week strike benefits to sue for them in those courts if he wants to do so.

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him there, that is quite true. The answer of the Senator, so far as it goes, is perfectly proper and tenable; but, by the same sign, if that be true, what right have we to say that a thing which is lawful in a State shall be unlawful?

Mr. REED. We can not say that. Nothing we can say in this bill will deprive a State court or a State legislature of any of its authority. All that we can do is to deal with Federal courts and Federal procedure and Federal law.

Mr. CHILTON. With all respect to the Senator, is not that an artful answer?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. CHILTON. If we have no jurisdiction to declare a thing unlawful, by what right shall we do so?

Mr. REED. Well, we are not undertaking to declare it unlawful, except in so far as we do have jurisdiction. We do have that jurisdiction when we deal with certain particular questions, and just so far as the Government's authority goes it will be declared unlawful, but it does not mean that it shall be held to be unlawful where the Government's authority does not extend. To illustrate, we have authority here to pass certain laws and we do pass them, but we do not add "this shall not affect the laws of other countries." Our law is limited by the jurisdiction which obtains on behalf of the Federal Government. So that when we use the term "shall not be declared unlawful," that can affect nothing except those matters about which the Federal Government has the right to legislate.

Mr. CHILTON. Let me ask the Senator one other question right there. Among other things, we say in this section that an injunction shall not be used to prevent anyone "from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful" and lawful means to quit work.

Suppose one coal operator might advise the men of another coal operator to cease work; suppose that that should involve a loss to the second coal operator—it is a matter in which labor is not interested one way or the other—and the latter should afterwards sue for damages for that act; is it possible that we want to say here that in no Federal court shall that act ever be held unlawful, or, in other words, that a suit could not be instituted to recover damages occasioned in that way? If that act can not be held to be unlawful, it can not be held that the aggrieved party is entitled to recover damages. It does seem to me now, when we think it over a second time, that we are going a little too far and are doing what we really have not a right to do.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that some of the injunctions issued by Federal courts in this country that have been most loudly complained against have not been issued under the Sherman law at all.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, certainly not; that is what I am talking about.

Mr. REED. When we provide that injunctions shall not issue, and then we undertake to add this qualifying clause:

Nor shall any of the act specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of the antitrust laws—

By implication we say that they might be held to be violations of other laws under which the Federal courts have already acted and issued injunctions of a very drastic nature.

Mr. CHILTON. I think not. We say that a Federal injunction shall not extend to these nine enumerated acts. Then we add a substantive provision, totally independent of that, that none of those acts shall be held to be violations of the antitrust laws.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question to see if I understand this proposition.

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. SHIELDS. Section 18 is not for the purpose of enacting any substantive law, but is to limit the operation of injunctions issued by Federal courts, as I understand.

Mr. CHILTON. That is right; clearly so.

Mr. SHIELDS. The concluding part of the last sentence, from the semicolon on, does, however, relate to substantive rights, as I understand the Senator?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. It provides that certain things shall not be unlawful; therefore they shall be lawful. We must bear in mind that section 18 has no reference to interstate commerce and is not authorized by the commerce clause of the Constitution. The acts which section 18 provides shall not be enjoined in the Federal courts do not concern interstate commerce or any subject over which Congress has jurisdiction.

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly; we are dealing with the jurisdiction of the courts which we have created.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood the Senator then correctly.

Mr. CHILTON. Absolutely.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, are we not endangering the constitutionality of the section when we are proposing to legislate upon a subject over which we have no power? We do not want to endanger the validity of this section by legislating upon a subject beyond the power of Congress. This particular section covers both intra and inter state acts, and under the case in Two hundred and seventh United States, the first employers' liability act case, it would be invalid. I think this is a matter to which we ought to give careful attention. We do not want section 18 to be declared invalid.

Mr. CHILTON. No; we do not. However, I would be of the opinion that this would be such a separable matter that even if the court should declare part of it without our power it could sustain the other part of the section. I am not so sure about that, but I would be inclined to view it in that way.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to refresh the Senator's mind. My recollection of why the Committee on the Judiciary struck out the word "unlawful" and inserted the words "to be violations of the antitrust laws" was that Congress has power over that subject but not the jurisdiction to say all these things shall be unlawful.

Mr. CHILTON. That was one of the considerations. I think the Senator is right.

The exceptions which we have made have been attacked on the ground that this is class legislation. I do not think so. He who looks to the future for the best that is in us as a Nation and a people must recognize that force can not bring labor and capital together. The recent happenings in many of the States must warn us that when this country shall be divided into two warring camps, then the Federal injunction is impotent. The time is near at hand when the best that is in every man will be demanded. As the "rule of the people" shall bring greater responsibilities to each citizen, so will his better impulses and higher motives guide and direct him.

Hide it as may be done, it is nevertheless true that there is a feeling among laborers and the people generally that their Government is not near enough to them. They want to participate more in everything that concerns their Government. This demand will soon be granted in every State. The Federal injunction is looked upon with a great deal of disfavor. Right or wrong, this fact must be kept in mind. No injunction can settle a labor dispute when it assumes proportions such as those conflicts which have recently threatened industry. There is no way to change man's nature by laws, injunctions, or arrests. The world is recognizing organized labor, and there is no use to attempt to fight the judgment of civilization. We must deal with this subject as it is, and there is no power that can take from its consideration the fact that millions of men are organized, and that the question of women and children and the demands of every prompting of humanity will enter into its solution. I want to see these industrial wars come to an end. I am not afraid to say that I want labor to have a fair share of the income of industry.

This country must look for relief for him from that desolation which finds him in his old age without means and without strength to work. The first thing to do is to treat labor as a human agency and not as a commodity. Whether the laborer works or not, he is a human being, a citizen, a voter, a part of this Government. He resents an injunction by wholesale in a labor dispute, if it be issued by a Federal court. It is needless to inquire why, and all sufficient to know that such is the fact. I want to restrict these Federal injunctions and relegate as far as possible everything in these labor disputes to the State courts. A better understanding, a getting together, will be the result. An American who feels that he is mistreated is a dangerous thing to deal with, but give him a fair chance to be heard, permit him to discuss his grievance, and you have a compromising citizen who is put upon his responsibility to do right, and then he will do right. Both sides to these disputes must realize that the country has rights and that society demands industrial peace. This law does not go so far as England and Australia have gone in recognizing the difference between the human machine and property rights. Surely free America wants to be in the lead in recognizing manhood. I have studied this question from every standpoint, desiring only to be right and to take the course which will best tend to bring industrial peace. There was little disagreement in the Judiciary Committee as to the provision reported. It is clearly right, and should not be opposed. The proposed amendment to reinsert the word "unlawful" is a mistake. I would be willing to vote for an amendment that would say "unlawful under the laws of the United States," and that is as far as we can go, in my judgment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not like to take up the time of the Senate at this late hour in any extended discussion of section 18, and I promise the Senate that I shall not do so.

I have been very much interested in the remarks of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and those of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] concerning the first clause of this section, and I have given it a great deal of personal consideration. I am unable, however, to coincide with the view of the Senator from Missouri, for whose opinion I have the highest respect, that the clause of section 18, upon page 27, declares in substance, or at all—unless you take the last clause of the sentence—that the acts and things which are exempt from the operation of the Federal injunction are in themselves lawful or that the statute makes them lawful. Of course the last clause of the sentence as it came over from the House does assume to do so; but if that clause were not added to the sentence at all, then surely the only effect of this sentence would be to prevent the extension of the Federal writ of injunction over and inclusive of them, and nothing more.

The Senator also said, and I wish to call his attention to this particularly, that these exemptions—of course I do not pretend to use his exact language—were designed to reach and cover certain claims or desires of labor organizations and to relieve them from the operation of existing laws, which have frequently been abused through the injunctive processes of the Federal courts. Now, I have no doubt this legislation originated from that source; but that, as drawn, it is confined to the purposes enumerated seems to me to be a wholly untenable proposition.

I have heard this section spoken of as class legislation. If it were class legislation, it would be open, perhaps, to a great many objections; but I am unable to perceive that it is class legislation at all, as it would be if it were confined to and designed for the benefit of some specific portion of the community or some specific organizations of the community.

It seems to me that as drawn this section in its operation may result in defeating the purpose of the entire bill. If we turn to the first section, we find the word "person" construed as embracing "corporation." Wherever the word "person" occurs in the bill I think it may be safely assumed, because of the definition on page 2, that it includes corporations and associations. Hence the words "person or persons" on the fourth line of page 27 mean corporations or associations as well as individuals, and the paragraph gives to these artificial persons the same rights, the same exemptions, the same authority, that are conferred upon individuals.

Let us see:

> And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment—

The corporation therefore has the same authority as the individual under this clause to terminate relations of employment—> from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceable means so to do—

The corporation has the same authority as the individual to cease to perform work or labor and to recommend, advise, or persuade others by peaceable means to do so—> or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working—

The corporation has the same authority as the individual to exercise that authority without any danger of the restraining processes of injunction—> from withholding their patronage from any party to such dispute, or or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do—

And so forth.

Mr. President, under this provision as it is drawn there is just as much power given to the corporation lawfully to discriminate against the organization as is given to the organization lawfully to discriminate against a particular employer or employee, and of course that involves the idea and the possibility of combination. A corporation may, as it frequently does, unite with certain labor organizations and direct their common purposes against a competitor which is offensive to both, and, by reason of the combined attack, either injure or wholly destroy it. What is there in the practical operation of this statute, especially if the language of the House be employed, to prevent such a condition being lawfully carried on as would result in the destruction of competition, and at the same time with no possibility of remedy except such remedy as might exist in the State courts, or independently of the antitrust law?

It seems to me, therefore, if this provision is adopted, in view of the fact that no exceptions whatever are made as to those who may obtain the benefit of the statute itself, that both in the interest of labor, in the interest of capital, and in the interest of the public the amendment that is proposed to be made here by the committee should stand. I am unable, therefore, to discern the existence of any class legislation in the part of the measure which is now under discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to this suggestion: In the first part of this paragraph, page 27, lines 3 and 4, it is declared:

> And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment,

If no restraining order can be issued to prevent the termination of an employment——

Mr. THOMAS. Either against the employer or the employee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On either side—then that is one of the acts referred to.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we add to that the provision "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful," would not the legal effect be that a corporation could terminate the employment of its men when they were under contract or the employment of a man under contract?

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Having hired him for 12 months, could it not break the contract in 2 weeks and then be free from liability under the contract?

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely. Why, the paragraph is reciprocal. I do not believe the original framers of the measure took into consideration the fact that it would be impartial in its operation. I think their desire to favor a class of people who have suffered from abuses of injunctions has blinded their eyes to the fact that in this particular section they have proposed legislation which will have not only the effect which the Senator declares, but which will also have the effect of legalizing a boycott against those people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But it undoubtedly would free every employer from liability under a contract that he made with his employees if he broke it long before the term expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I think so, Mr. President, and I think it would also legalize combinations of employers as against labor organizations; that it would not only legalize them, but it would take away all remedies which are designed to be summary in their character, no matter how great the exigency may be for their exercise.

This is not a matter of surprise to me, perhaps, because I have had a similar experience in one or two matters of State legislation. Take the initiative and referendum: That was designed to overcome the inertia of legislatures, and also to overcome the refusal of general assemblies to carry out the wishes of the people and become obstacles instead of agencies for the transaction of public business. Of course, however, the initiative and referendum are embodied in a general constitutional amendment and privilege, one of which all classes and conditions of men can take advantage—the laboring man and the capitalist, the black man and the white man—but the advocates of the initiative and referendum have for the most part advocated it from the standpoint of its remedial effect and benefit to certain elements of society only.

Let me give an illustration of the manner in which it can operate and has been operating impartially. The legislature of my State enacted a statute which was called an eight-hour law. It was not satisfactory, and it was referred by the workingmen of the State under the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution of my State. The corporations immediately initiated a statute and the labor organizations initiated another. We had, therefore, three statutes upon the subject before the people, and upon which they voted. While the legislative act was rejected, both of the initiated acts were adopted by majority votes, and they were so irreconcilable with each other that the legislature was compelled to call upon the supreme court to ascertain whether it had the power to repeal an initiated law; and, the supreme court having held that it did have that power, the exigency of the situation made it necessary for them practically to repeal both of these statutes and enact one that was substantially correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that the general result of laws initiated in the Senator's State?

Mr. THOMAS. No; that is not the general result, but it may be the general result, because, as I have stated—perhaps the Senator did not hear me—provisions of that kind, although advocated for certain purposes and for certain ends, nevertheless become shields as well as swords.

Mr. OVERMAN. But I understood the Senator to say that the legislature initiated one plan, the corporations another, and the laboring people another; that the legislative act was defeated, the one initiated by the corporations was carried, and the one initiated by the laboring men was carried, although inconsistent with each other.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator understood me correctly; whereupon the legislature was obliged to take hold of and unravel that tangle, and did so.

Take the public-utilities law passed by the general assembly of my State—a most excellent law; a very desirable one. It was referred by the corporations, and as a consequence it does not and can not go into effect until the people shall pass upon the referendum at the coming election; and such will be the operation of this paragraph if it becomes a part of the laws of the country. I do not want it to become so—and hence I have taken up this comparatively small portion of time—without emphasizing in advance the fact that it is going to be a weapon against as well as a protection for the laboring classes of the country.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that an executive session is desired, and it is impossible to get through with the committee amendments this afternoon, I desire at this time to proffer a proposal for a unanimous-consent agreement with reference to the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, August 29, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the roll call is commenced, does the Senator urge that the proposal be presented at this time, or would it suit——

Mr. CULBERSON. I present it now. We must have a quorum anyway for the executive session.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that I shall not consent to that proposition. I say that just to save the time to call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then there is no necessity for calling the roll. The Senator from Washington objects.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Washington objects?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it not out of order for him to object at this time?

Mr. JONES. I simply wanted to state that I would object. I thought that would save the calling of the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington says he will object. If the Senator from Texas desires to have the roll called, it will be called.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply presented the matter under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is, however, perfectly apparent that it is idle to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well. I do not insist upon it, then.

Mr. JONES. I wish to say to the Senator that I would not object to a proposition to begin, say, at 2 o'clock, and under the regular parliamentary procedure, with a certain amount of debate on each amendment or proposition presented, have the bill disposed of; but I would not want to set a time when we shall begin to vote on the bill and amendments without permitting any debate thereafter. That is all.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of Montezuma Tribe, No. 77, Improved Order of Red Men, of San Francisco, Cal., and a petition of San Francisco Parlor, No. 49, Native Sons of the Golden West, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented a petition of sundry citizens of Gorham, Me., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the board of directors of the Spokane & Eastern Trust Co., of Spokane, Wash., praying for a reduction of governmental expenses rather than increased taxation to meet the emergencies of the present situation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 6396) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Otis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 6397) to amend section 13 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act;

A bill (S. 6398) to amend section 1 of an act approved May 30, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the national banking laws"; and

A bill (S. 6399) to amend section 9 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On August 25, 1914:

S. 5197. An act granting public lands to the city and county of Denver, in the State of Colorado, for public park purposes;

S. 5673. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 3, 1911; and

S. 5739. An act to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government.

On August 20, 1914:

S. 6315. An act to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Thursday, August 27, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, August 28, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 27, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful God, our heavenly Father, we bless Thee for every great thought, for every noble deed, for every passion slain, for every moral victory, for every true friendship, for the love that never faileth, for every upward help which brings mankind nearer to each other in the bonds of brotherhood and nearer to Thee, our God and our Father. And we pray that the genius of the Christian religion may be fulfilled in a world-wide peace. And glory and honor and praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not see how any Member can conscientiously draw his salary unless he listens to the reading of the Journal, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I suppose a quorum is not present now, and I therefore move a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has not yet announced it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Aswell	Bartholdt	Browne, Wis.
Aiken	Austin	Bartlett	Browning
Ainey	Baltz	Beall, Tex.	Brumbaugh
Ansberry	Barchfeld	Bell, Ga.	Calder
Anthony	Barkley	Brown, N. Y.	Church
Clancy	Gill	Lafferty	Peterson
Cooper	Gittins	Langham	Plumley
Copley	Glass	Langley	Porter
Covington	Graham, Ill.	Lazaro	Powers
Crisp	Graham, Pa.	L'Engle	Rainey
Decker	Griest	Lenroot	Riordan
Dickinson	Guernsey	Lewis, Pa.	Rogers
Dies	Hamill	Lindquist	Rubey

Gallivan	Knowland, J. R.	Padgett	Whaley
Gardner	Konop	Patten, N. Y.	Wilson, N. Y.
George	Kreider	Peters	Winslow

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 290 Members have responded—a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BUTLER. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 153, noes 76.

Mr. BUTLER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory. There is no question as to the result of the vote to dispense with further proceedings under the call. And there can be no question but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes his motion for no other purpose than to delay the House in its proceedings. If it was a vote of moment, of course the gentleman would be entitled to a roll call. But a quorum being here, it is absolutely necessary to dispense with further proceedings under the call in order that the House may transact business. There can be no purpose in the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania except to delay by dilatory tactics.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose that the gentleman shall question my motive. I am a Member of this House, and have a right to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not question the gentleman's motives. They are so apparent that nobody could question them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has a perfect right to insist that the motion is dilatory, if he wishes to do so. It is not a personal reflection on the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his efforts to maintain a quorum, introduced a resolution, which the House passed a few days ago, for the purpose of getting Members back to Washington.

Now, this side of the House has the right to make an effort to have the Sergeant at Arms bring them back. It is not a dilatory proposition at all. Whether it ought to be done or not is for the House to determine. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] proposes one way to get them back, by deducting pay. We may propose another way to get them back by having the Sergeant at Arms not merely telegraph for them, but to issue warrants for their arrest and have them come back. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the right of demanding the yeas and nays is a constitutional right which can not be swept away by a gesture.

The SPEAKER. The last roll call showed that there were 290 Members present, very much above a quorum; and yet the demand for the yeas and nays is a constitutional right. It does not make any difference what the gentleman is up to [laughter]; that is one of the things that the Speakers of the House have always been very careful about. Those in favor of calling the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-eight gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number—and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of dispensing with further proceedings under the call will answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 226, nays 69, answered "present" 5, not voting 131, as follows:

ACTS OF SEVENTH LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d of this month the President of the United States transmitted to the Congress copies of the acts and resolutions of the extraordinary session of 1913 and regular and extraordinary sessions of 1914 of the Seventh Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico, and stated in his message transmitting these copies that they had not been printed. I therefore ask that they be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks to have printed as a House document the acts and proceedings of the last Porto Rico Legislature.

Mr. JONES. Of the extraordinary session of 1913 and the regular and extraordinary sessions of 1914.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BARNHART. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman from Virginia a printed copy of the document?

Mr. JONES. There are, I believe, only one or two printed copies, and they came from Porto Rico.

Mr. MANN. The law requires them to send several copies. What good will it do for us to print the Porto Rican laws, they having been printed in Porto Rico, and being in possession of the people of Porto Rico who need to make use of them?

Mr. JONES. I am informed by the War Department that there are many requests for these laws. My attention was called by the War Department to the fact that the message transmitting this document had been sent to the House, and that while it had been referred by the House to the Committee on Insular Affairs no order was made looking to printing the acts.

Mr. MANN. I remember a few years ago we did order some such document printed——

Mr. JONES. I think it has been the custom in the past.

Mr. MANN. And there were a large number printed, and they were absolutely useless. I suggest to the gentleman that he introduce a resolution to print the document and have the resolution go before the Committee on Printing. It will be a privileged matter, and in that way the committee will have an opportunity to ascertain what copies are needed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that copies of the laws of the Philippines have been published recently as a Senate document, and that the War Department is very anxious to have this printing done as soon as possible. My attention has been called to it twice. I have no personal interest at all in the matter, but the War Department is very anxious that this shall be done. There are demands in this country for copies of these laws, and they are not by any means useless documents.

Mr. MANN. Naturally, the War Department is very anxious to have the House print, out of the congressional printing fund, documents for the use of the War Department instead of having them printed out of the War Department fund.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the gentleman understands that the War Department has jurisdiction over Porto Rican matters.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. JONES. And he understands, of course, that applications are constantly being made to the War Department for documents of this sort.

Mr. MANN. And I understand—although I may be mistaken about it—that the War Department has full power to print this; but it would have to pay for it out of the appropriation for the War Department printing.

Mr. JONES. I am not able to speak positively as to that; but I should not think that the War Department ought to pay for this printing, even if it has a printing fund and authority to use it for this purpose. This printing is for the use of Congress. The War Department should not be required to have it done out of its funds, even if it could do so, as to which I have no information.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The War Department, like all other departments, makes up its estimates each year for the appropriation bill. The War Department certainly knew of this extraordinary session of the Legislature of Porto Rico, and it had ample time before the passage of the appropriation bill to estimate for this printing. But it is the custom of many of the departments to make their estimates and then get just as much printing out of Congress as they possibly can, and until I can have some further information on it than that the department wants it and that it has no provision to pay for it I shall object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is going to object, I shall be very glad to get this information and call the matter up at a later date.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on August 27, 1914, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 92. An act to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation, in Wyoming.

OFFICE OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a report from the Secretary of Agriculture in response to a resolution of inquiry asking about a press agency in the department. If there be no objection, this report will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, August 21, 1914.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I have the honor of complying with the request and direction of the House of Representatives that I furnish detailed information called for in House resolution 573.

First. A press agency, as defined and commonly understood, is one which looks after newspaper advertising for any sort of enterprise. There is not under the administration of the Department of Agriculture any such agency. As a matter of fact, the department, by specific rule, strictly prohibits the employment of any press agent or publicity expert for the purpose of advertising the department, any bureau, or any individual connected with the Department of Agriculture, and chiefs of bureaus and heads of offices and divisions are instructed to see that no work of this character is performed by any of the employees under them.

There is under the administration of the Department of Agriculture an Office of Information. The facts concerning this office are a matter of record. Its purpose is discussed in the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1913.

The reasons for its establishment and its function were set forth by Assistant Secretary Galloway before the House Committee on Agriculture in December.

This work was entered upon in pursuance of the organic act creating a Department of Agriculture, "the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word," and in efficient execution of the purposes of the department.

The Nation is spending through the department many millions of dollars in acquiring agricultural information. It would seem to be little short of criminal to spend millions of dollars to acquire information and not to use every possible efficient agency available for placing it at the disposal of the people as promptly as possible. It is the purpose of the office with as little delay as possible, through every proper medium, to give the knowledge which the department possesses as the result of investigations and field work to all the people who desire it or should have it. The office undertakes to deal solely with facts, with suggestions of remedies, and of methods of applying them in every field of agriculture.

Up to a comparatively short time ago the printed matter conveying information was in the form of bulletins and circulars limited to issues of from two to forty thousand copies. Not infrequently much time was required for the final preparation of the bulletin, for its printing, and for its distribution. In the nature of things, the bulletins could not reach a great mass of the farmers. Many farmers did not even know of the existence of the department, and knew nothing of the service it could render. They did not know of the existence of bulletins which would be helpful to them or how to secure them, and in many cases they could secure them only with considerable inconvenience and some expense. Furthermore, the bulletins were not infrequently difficult to interpret, to understand, and to apply. One particular duty of the office is to prepare matter which frequently comes from the bureau in technical or scientific form in simple language more readily understood by the great mass of lay readers. Again, it seemed easier through this office to select matter of special value to particular districts or sections of the Union and to prepare and have it distributed to such sections quickly. Emergencies frequently arise in which information to be of value must be placed within a few hours in the hands of the farmers. The delay in issuing official printed bulletins and mailing them often defeated the possibility of service. In case of distant States the mailing time to and from Washington caused from 12 days to 2 weeks to elapse before the desired information could be delivered. In many cases, where the department's supply of printed publications was exhausted, it was necessary to inform the farmer that he must send 5 or 10 cents to the superintendent of documents to obtain the desired publications. This involved on the farmer's part the writing of a second letter to the superintendent of documents and another delay of 12 days or 2 weeks. In cases actually worked out, where the publication desired was not available from the department, farmers in Pacific Coast States have been unable to obtain the information in less than 30 days. In short, it seemed a matter of great urgency to make available through every proper channel at the earliest possible moment to the 6,000,000 farm families of the Union the knowledge which the department had acquired and was increasingly acquiring, and to do this in as simple language as possible.

As the result of long observation, as well as of careful survey, the department reached the conclusion that, aside from the conveying of information by competent persons directly to farmers on their farms, the most efficient medium for reaching the farmers was the agricultural press, and that next to this the most efficient mediums were the daily and weekly press which devoted space to agricultural matters. It was ascertained that these journals would gladly use material if it were furnished to them in such form as to be readily available. It seemed desirable to have an office which could do this, because through it the matter could be more accurately and efficiently presented. It was also discovered that representative journals would telegraph to their home offices items giving important and urgent agricultural information bearing upon pressing problems.

This whole matter was made the subject of a conference with the chiefs of bureaus, other officers of the department, and expert writers and journalists. As the result of this conference the plan described was agreed upon.

RESULTS OF THE WORK OF THE OFFICE.

Not only has the establishment of this office resulted in a fuller knowledge on the part of the farmers of the fact that they can get assistance and that bulletins are available, but it has led to a much larger call for bulletins and supplied a vast amount of information to the journals to which reference has been made.

During the fiscal years 1913 and 1914 the staff of the Office of Information prepared and issued in mimeograph form to the agricultural press and newspapers 512 summaries or condensed statements of facts and 30 special items to the press associations covering quarantine notices and supplementary statements regarding crop estimates. In addition, each week from 10 to 20 pages of typewritten material have been prepared specially and supplied to rural weekly papers. In each case the summary was circulated only to editors in the geographic or agricultural territory to which the information is directly applicable. The office also has cooperated with many editors or their representatives, who write or telephone or call in person for special information needed by them in the preparation of agricultural articles. The office has answered daily from 20 to 40 letters requesting information not covered directly by existing publications or not falling within the province of any one of the department's bureaus or offices.

While no effort has been made to keep a complete account of the use of material by publications, a rough estimate of the circulation has been made. It is established that the material issued by the Office of Information has appeared at least on the following number of printed pages in the public press during the months indicated:

	Monthly circulation.
November, 1913	137,993,802
December, 1913	179,075,030
January, 1914	218,239,313
February, 1914	243,175,625
March, 1914	275,697,536
April, 1914	288,331,997
May, 1914	270,686,427
June, 1914	303,783,190
July, 1914	310,376,171

These figures do not accurately represent the total circulation of this material. They do not include the department's material which appears in the pages of nearly every agricultural journal and much special material on practical farming carried by weekly country papers.

As a result of this service many daily papers which heretofore had given no attention to agriculture are now devoting considerable space to publishing the department's brief, simple statements as to improved methods of farming or as to control of crop pests of direct local value. These reach the farmers promptly through the Rural Free Delivery Service.

Second. Twelve persons are employed in the Office of Information. These are under the direction of George W. Wharton, as Chief of the Office of Information.

The following list gives the name of each employee of the office, the salary that he receives, and roll upon which he is carried:

Name and salary.	Title.	Roll.
Wharton, George W. ($3,000)	Chief, Office of Information.	Chemistry (any lump).
Mitchell, Edward B. ($2,000)	Assistant chief	Do.
Dunlap, Maurice ($1,600)[1]	Clerk, class 3	Secretary (statutory).
Brennan, Robert T. ($1,400)	Clerk, class 2	Bureau of Animal Industry (any lump).
Hafford, Thomas A. ($1,200)	Clerk, class 1	Office of Experiment Stations (any lump).
Anderson, M. N. ($1,200)	do	Secretary (statutory).
Anderson, A. S. ($1,020)	Clerk	Chemistry (statutory).
Higgins, Hugh ($1,000)	do	Secretary (statutory).
Hill, Ira B. ($900)	Stenographer-typist	Chemistry (statutory).
Clark, John H. ($900)	Clerk-typist	Forestry (statutory).
Connors, John J. ($840)	Skilled laborer	Secretary (statutory).
White, Maurice B. ($480)	Messenger boy	Do.

[1] Writer.

Third. George W. Wharton is employed in the Department of Agriculture as Chief of the Office of Information. His duties are:

(a) To organize and direct the work of the Office of Information, and to translate the scientific and technical discoveries, reports, and orders of the department into simple, practical statements of facts, so as to make them readily intelligible to lay readers and so as to secure their widespread publication in the agricultural and other publications.

(b) To prepare the material for and issue the Weekly News Letter to Crop Correspondents, and to serve as a member of the editorial committee of the farmers' bulletin known as the Agricultural Outlook, published monthly during the crop season.

(c) On the order of the Secretary, to conduct special inquiries, such as that recently addressed to the housewives of farmers, and to prepare special reports, bulletins, and other publications for the office of the Secretary.

(d) To collect or direct the collection of special agricultural data for special districts, and to aid in the preparation and dissemination of information specifically adapted to the agriculture of different localities. This has resulted in a complete card index, giving the agricultural production and summaries of information for each congressional district in the United States.

Mr. Wharton receives a salary of $3,000 per annum, payable as follows:

July 1 to October 1, 1914, by the Bureau of Chemistry.
October 1, 1914, to January 1, 1915, by the Bureau of Plant Industry.
January 1 to April 1, 1915, by the Bureau of Animal Industry.
April 1 to July 1, 1915, by the Weather Bureau.

These bureaus furnish the greater part of the material which the office prepares for publication.

Mr. Wharton was temporarily appointed, with the consent of the Civil Service Commission, as Chief of the Office of Information, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, on June 7, 1913.

When the Office of Information was created, on May 16, 1913, the Civil Service Commission had no list of eligibles from which a chief of the office could be appointed. On May 24, 1913, the department requested the Civil Service Commission to hold an examination at the earliest practicable date to establish a list of eligibles for this position, and in order that the work might be begun at once the Civil Service Commission was requested to authorize a temporary appointment. On May 26, 1913, the Civil Service Commission authorized the department to appoint temporarily a Chief of the Office of Information. The letter of the department to the commission and the commission's reply are attached hereto, marked, respectively, Exhibits "A" and "B."

On August 18, 1913, the Civil Service Commission announced a competitive examination for the position of Chief of the Office of Information. A copy of the notice of examination is attached hereto, marked "Exhibit C." Mr. Wharton took this examination and passed at the head of the list. On October 20, 1913, the Civil Service Commission forwarded to the department certificate No. 9016, a copy of which is attached hereto, marked "Exhibit D," giving a list of eligibles from which to make a permanent appointment of Chief of the Office of Information. On November 5, 1913, Mr. Wharton was given a probationary appointment, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, and at the conclusion of the probationary period of six months Mr. Wharton's appointment was made permanent. On July 1, 1914, as a result of service performed, Mr. Wharton's salary was increased to $3,000 per annum.

Fourth. Edward B. Mitchell is employed in the Department of Agriculture as Assistant Chief of the Office of Information. He was temporarily appointed March 17, 1914, with the consent of the Civil Service Commission, at a salary of $2,000 per annum, on the miscellaneous roll of the Bureau of Chemistry.

Mr. Mitchell prepares for publication statements of the results of the department's work. He assists the Chief of the Office of Information in the direction of its work and serves as acting chief in the absence of the chief.

The growth of the work of the Office of Information early in 1914 made it necessary to appoint an assistant possessing executive and editorial ability. Of the three eligibles remaining on the Civil Service list for the position of chief after the appointment of Mr. Wharton, one declined the position of assistant chief; one had already been appointed to a subordinate position in the office, and the third was deemed not to have had sufficient training and experience to warrant his appointment as assistant chief. The department, accordingly, on March 7, 1914, requested the Civil Service Commission to hold an examination to establish an eligible register from which an Assistant Chief of the Office of Information could be appointed, and at the same time requested the commission to authorize a temporary appointment. On March 12, 1914, the Civil Service Commission granted permission to make the appointment. Copies of the department's letter to the commission and the commission's reply are attached hereto, marked Exhibits "E" and "F."

On March 17, 1914, Mr. Mitchell was temporarily appointed Assistant Chief of the Office of Information, and on May 18 the Civil Service Commission announced a competitive examination for this position. A copy of the notice of examination is attached hereto, marked "Exhibit G." On June 10, 1914, the Civil Service Commission furnished the department with certificate No. 10601 (copy of which is attached hereto, marked "Exhibit H"), giving a list of eligibles for appointment to the position of Assistant Chief of the Office of Information. Mr. Mitchell was No. 1 on the list, and on June 16, 1914, he was given a probationary appointment as Assistant Chief of the Office of Information for a period of six months at a salary of $2,000 per annum, on the miscellaneous roll of the Bureau of Chemistry.

Fifth. This office is not now being used and never has been used for private interests, either directly or indirectly. As has been stated, it limits itself to the discussion of established facts and approved information. It has refrained from discussing personnel, entering into controversies, or commenting on legislation. It has not dealt with the policies of the department, discussed future measures, or praised individuals or organizations.

Respectfully, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

[Inclosures.]

EXHIBIT A.

MAY 24, 1913.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

SIR: I would respectfully request that a special examination be held at the earliest practicable date for the purpose of establishing an eligible list from which selection and appointment may be made of a male chief of the Office of Information in this department, at a salary at the rate of $2,500 per annum. Pending the establishment of such an eligible list it is respectfully requested that the commission issue an approval certificate authorizing a temporary appointment.

The Office of Information, about to be created in this department, is to act as a clearing house of information between the scientific sources and the public direct and through the press, for the purpose of increasing the amount of printed agricultural information developed by the Department of Agriculture and to heighten the direct educational value of published matter. Through this work the following general results will be sought:

1. A wider dissemination of information concerning the scientific discoveries and researches of the department through the extraction from technical bulletins of material of popular interest or practical value, and its presentation in a form that will be understandable and usable by the general public.

2. A better understanding on the part of the public of the work of the Department of Agriculture, of the functions of its various bureaus and offices, of the processes on which it bases recommendations, and thus to bring about a closer cooperation between the department and the people.

The special examination referred to should be limited to males between 30 and 45 years of age, and consist of the following subjects and weights:

1. Education: A degree from a college of good standing is a prerequisite	20
2. Experience in educational extension work	40
3. Editorial experience	20
4. Published papers or magazine articles, prepared by applicant, tending to show fitness for work of this particular type	20
	100

In view of the fact that it is desired to inaugurate this new line of work immediately, it is respectfully requested that as prompt action as possible be taken on this request.

Very respectfully, B. T. GALLOWAY, Acting Secretary.

EXHIBIT B.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 26, 1913.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: In reply to the department's letter of May 24, 1913, the commission has the honor to state that prompt attention will be given to the matter of holding an examination to provide eligibles for filling the position of Chief of Office of Information at a salary of $2,500 per annum.

Authority is granted under section 2 of rule 8 for the appointment of a person pending the establishment of a register, on condition that he make application for the examination.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully, JOHN C. BLACK, President.

UNITED STATES CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATION—CHIEF, OFFICE OF INFORMATION (MALE).—AUGUST 18, 1913.

The United States Civil Service Commission announces an open competitive examination for chief, Office of Information, for men only. From the register of eligibles resulting from this examination certification will be made to fill a vacancy in this position in the Office of Information, Department of Agriculture Washington, D. C., at $2,500 a year, and vacancies as they may occur in positions requiring similar qualifications, unless it is found to be in the interest of the service to fill any vacancy by reinstatement, transfer, or promotion.

The Office of Information will act as a clearing house of information between the scientific sources and the public, direct and through the press, for the purpose of increasing the amount of printed agricultural information developed by the Department of Agriculture and to heighten the direct educational value of published matter. An effort will be made to gain a wider dissemination of information concerning the scientific discoveries and researches of the department through the extraction from technical bulletins of material of popular interest or practical value and its presentation in a form that will be understandable and usable by the general public, and a better understanding on the part of the public of the work of the Department of Agriculture, thus bringing about a closer cooperation between the department and the people.

It is desired to secure the services of a man who has had experience in the preparation of special articles for publication, presenting the results of scientific investigations in a popular form.

Competitors will not be assembled for examination, but will be rated on the following subjects, which will have the relative weights indicated:

Subjects.	Weights.
1. Education and training	30
2. Practical experience and fitness	40
3. Published papers or magazine articles	30
Total	100

An educational training equivalent to that required for graduation from a college or university of recognized standing is a prerequisite for consideration for this position.

Under subject 2 consideration will be given to experience in editorial or magazine work; or in educational extension work in connection with experiment stations or agricultural colleges; or in any line of work which tends to fit the applicant to perform the duties outlined in the second paragraph.

Statements as to education, training, experience, and fitness are accepted subject to verification.

Applicants must have reached their thirtieth but not their forty-fifth birthday on the date of the examination.

Under an act of Congress applicants for this examination must have been actually domiciled in the State or Territory in which they reside for at least one year previous to the date of the examination.

This examination is open to all men who are citizens of the United States and who meet the requirements.

Persons who meet the requirements and desire this examination should at once apply for Form 304 and special form to the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.; the secretary of the board of examiners, post office, Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Atlanta, Ga.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Chicago, Ill.; St. Paul, Minn.; Seattle, Wash.; San Francisco, Cal.; customhouse, New York, N. Y.; New Orleans, La.; Honolulu, Hawaii; old customhouse, St. Louis, Mo.; or to the chairman of the Porto Rican Civil Service Commission, San Juan, P. R. No application will be accepted unless properly executed and filed with the commission at Washington, with the material required, prior to the hour of closing business on August 18, 1913. In applying for this examination the exact title as given at the head of this announcement should be used.

Issued July 23, 1913.

To the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: In response to your request, No. —, of May 24, 1913, for males eligible for probational appointment to a vacancy existing in class $2,500 per annum, Chief Office of Information, Department of Agriculture, certification is hereby made under the civil service rules of the following-named eligibles: 80–5980

Name.	State.	Examination.	Grade.	Number of times previously certified.	Post-office address.
George W. Wharton	New York	Chief Office of Information.	85.50	.....	195 Union Street, Flushing, L. I., N. Y.
Bristow Adams	California	.....do.....	80.60	.....	2923 South Dakota Avenue, Washington, D. C.
Maurice Dunlap	Minnesota	.....do.....	71	.....	1737 T Street NW., Washington, D. C.

together with those not appointed whose names appear on certificate No. —.

You are authorized to select and appoint one of the eligibles thus certified.

By direction of the commission.

T. P. CHAPMAN, Acting Secretary.

Certification at a salary materially less than the usual entrance rate is made on condition that the person selected shall not be promoted within six months after selection unless during this period his name would be reached for certification at the salary to which promotion is proposed.

The commission requests that the examination papers sent with this certificate be promptly returned with the report of selection, in order that the eligibles not selected may not lose opportunity for appointment to other vacancies.

MARCH 7, 1914.

The UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to request that a special examination be held at the earliest practicable date for the purpose of establishing an eligible register from which an Assistant Chief of the Office of Information may be appointed in this department, at a salary at the rate of $2,000 per annum. For this position we desire to secure a man who has a degree from a college of good standing, who has had experience in educational-extension work and in editorial work, and who has written articles that have been published as papers or as magazine articles. His services are needed to assist the Chief of the Office of Information in the general work of the office, which was established for the purpose of increasing the amount of printed agricultural information developed by the Department of Agriculture and to heighten the direct educational value of published matter, and which acts as a clearing house of information between the scientific sources and the public direct and through the press. The special examination requested should be limited to males between 30 and 45 years of age, and should consist of the following subjects and weights:

Subjects.	Weights.
1. Education and training	30
2. Practical experience	40
3. Published papers or magazine articles	30

Pending the establishment of this register and the certification of eligibles therefrom, it is respectfully requested that authority be issued authorizing the department to make a temporary appointment.

We would use to fill this position the register resulting from the special examination held on August 18, 1913, for Chief of the Office of Information, but this examination resulted in but four eligibles, Mr. George W. Wharton and Mr. Maurice Dunlap, who have been appointed therefrom; Mr. Bristow Adams, who is now receiving a salary of $2,100 per annum in the Forest Service of this department and who has declined to accept the position of Assistant Chief of the Office of Information; and Mr. O. C. Gillette, of Madison, Wis., who has been carefully considered for the place. Mr. Gillette made a trip from Madison, Wis., to Washington for conference regarding the work, but after carefully considering this man we do not believe that he would meet our requirements.

Very respectfully,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Acting Secretary.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1914.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: In reply to the department's letter of March 7 the commission has the honor to state that prompt attention will be given to the matter of holding an examination to provide a register from which the position of Assistant Chief of the Office of Information may be filled, at a salary of $2,000 per annum.

Authority is granted under section 2, of Rule VIII, for the appointment of a person outside the register on condition that he make application for the examination when it is announced. The name of the person appointed under this authority should be reported to the commission by letter when the appointment is made.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. M. GALLOWAY,
Acting President.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD concerning the agricultural, dairying, lumbering, and binding-twine industries of the third congressional district of Minnesota, including also the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agriculture, dairying, lumbering, and binding twine in the third district of Minnesota. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff effect on agriculture, dairying, and farming generally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the effect of the tariff on agriculture, dairying, and farming in general. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it in order to proceed with debate on the seamen's bill—S. 136?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] please occupy some of his time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when I have occupied five minutes, I will thank you to notify me.

This proposition which is before the House, the House amendment to Senate bill 136, has had long and faithful consideration before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. During the absence of the chairman of the committee, at the time he was attending the meetings of the international conference at London, last year, hearings upon the bill were held, which were conducted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] as acting chairman, in which all the parties interested in the Senate bill which was then before the committee were heard. There are some features of the amendment under consideration to which I do not fully agree, but I wish to record here the fairness shown by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] in presiding over that committee, and his extreme liberality to persons who desired to be heard before the committee, in order that all the facts might be presented. The amendment as proposed is in my judgment a vast improvement over the bill which came to the House from the Senate.

I hope if this amendment is adopted by the House that we shall finally be able to secure an improved bill, which will be greatly in the interest and advancement of the merchant marine of the United States. There are many features in this bill that are great improvements over the existing law. It provides increased facilities for taking care of human life on all passenger steamers and greater opportunities for men employed on the vessels in all classes of the maritime service.

There are some conditions in the amendment which in my opinion are detrimental to the men who furnish the capital and who own the steamers, and I think it puts a greater burden on these steamship owners than they ought to be called upon to bear. But it was the judgment of the majority of the committee that these requirements should be made, and some of them were assented to by the vessel owners.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is there any provision in the bill as it is now drawn which will permit the running of the New York boats—for instance, the Coney Island boats——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is all provided for.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The Rockaway Beach boats and boats of that character?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is provided for in the bill under the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. So that these boats will be relieved from the provisions that the gentleman spoke of?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Many of the objectionable provisions in the bill, as the bill came from the Senate, have been removed by the House committee, and the amendment now under consideration in general meets the conditions as presented to the committee by the New York steamship owners. I wish to say that, while I do not think it gives all the privileges it ought to have given to the men who own the steamships, it gives a great many more benefits than were provided in the Senate bill. The Senate bill would practically have stopped navigation if it had been adopted by the House and received the approval of the President. This bill affects all the vessels that may be admitted to American registry under the law that has already been adopted, known as Public Law 175, H. R. 18202, except for the fact that there are some exceptions in this law by which the President can relieve foreign-built vessels, but there are no exceptions that would relieve American-built vessels.

I have noticed in the regulations which have been published as to what the Department of Commerce has recommended to the President, that it makes no reference to relief for American-built vessels or for American-operated vessels, from any condition whatever, but it does provide for all the various merchant vessels for all the countries of Europe if admitted to American registry, and gives to owners of such vessels extensive privileges not allowed to American vessels. If the President issues the orders as recommended by the Department of Commerce, all vessels will be subject, in addition to whatever law may be enacted finally, as the result of our action to-day. In so far as it will be especially burdensome on the American vessel owners, it will become so because of the allowances made to foreign vessels and those practically in foreign ownership, because the law above referred to provides that vessels bearing the American flag which have been built in foreign shipyards, admitted to American registry, and manned by foreign officers and watch officers will be allowed privileges denied to vessels owned by Americans and built in American shipyards by American workmen.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; but I trust the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. MOORE. Does the statement the gentleman has made, that we can accept foreign ships under the law passed the other day, include foreign measurement and foreign inspection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. If the President issues the order.

Mr. MOORE. There must be an American inspection and survey for vessels built in the United States?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There is no provision of law exempting American-built vessels, but the law does provide for the exemption of foreign-built vessels which may be granted American registry to help take care of our foreign trade.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman mean to say that the law referred to favors the foreign shipbuilder against the American shipbuilder?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. How does that apply to vessels on the inland waterways?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. They would not be affected, because the foreign-built vessels would not have the right to enter inland waterways.

Mr. MOORE. In the matter of protection of life we must take foreign inspection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The law provides as follows:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

Under like conditions, in like manner, and to like extent the President of the United States is also hereby authorized to suspend the provisions of the law requiring survey, inspection, and measurement by officers of the United States of foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under this act.

And, furthermore, in the statement made by the Department of Commerce a regulation is proposed to relieve the foreign vessels that may be admitted to American registry in whatever port they may be located abroad, they may not be subjected to our measurement laws, but may be accepted as American vessels by United States consuls in any port of the world and be subject to the law of measurement established by foreign Governments.

Mr. MOORE. Even under this law a foreign purchased vessel has a preference over an American vessel?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The regulations proposed by the Department of Commerce so provide.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. This is really an emergency measure?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I hope it may become so.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the President have the right to give the same benefits to American-built ships that he has to foreign-built ships?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is not so provided under the law, as I understand it. I submit the following article taken from the New York Sun of Wednesday, August 26, 1914, which explains itself:

NEEDN'T REMEASURE SHIPS FOR REGISTRY—DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE ADOPTS REGULATION TO EXPEDITE CHANGE—CONSULS MAY DO THE WORK—PLACING OF VESSELS UNDER AMERICAN FLAG NOW DEPENDS ON PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, August 25.

Edmund F. Sweet, Acting Secretary of Commerce, has taken steps to expedite the registering of foreign-built ships under the American flag. It has been decided that it will not be necessary for these vessels to be physically present at American ports to be registered. This, it is believed, will materially shorten the time needed for the registering of many vessels. Arrangements are being made so that consuls of the United States can perfect the registry of vessels after application has been made to the Department of Commerce.

Acting Secretary Sweet to-day issued a regulation to remove a mistaken idea that there is a wide difference between American regulations for measuring vessels and the regulations of other maritime nations. It is stated that there are slight differences in some features, but to a great extent these offset one another. The principal difference is in the interpretation of the words "shelter decks," the British authorities construing them somewhat more liberally than American authorities. But the British collect tonnage and lighthouse duties on deck cargoes, while the United States does not. The regulation issued to-day to collectors of customs is as follows:

"Merchant vessels of Great Britain, Belgium, Denmark, Austria-Hungary, the German Empire, Italy, Sweden, Norway, Spain, the Netherlands, Russia, Finland, Portugal, Japan, and France will be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of register or other national papers, and it shall not be necessary for such vessels to be remeasured at any port of the United States, the measurement law of these countries being substantially similar to the laws of the United States. This regulation supersedes the department's regulations included in article 85, Customs Regulations, 1908, and so much of article 87 as may conflict with this order."

This new regulation will remove one obstacle to American registry, as many shipowners have been contending that the American rules for measuring tonnage added materially to the cost of operation as compared with the rules of other countries.

How many foreign vessels will register under the American flag depends now on the action of the President. The Department of Commerce has recommended that the President suspend the present law, which requires that the watch officers on all vessels of American registry shall be citizens of the United States. The recent registry act leaves this to the President's discretion.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; if the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman explain if this will apply to boats sailing from Duluth to Liverpool loaded with grain?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman may ask the chairman of the committee, who is an able lawyer, and if he has no more time I will yield him additional time later if he wishes it. I am not a lawyer, and I am not going to undertake to quote the law.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 10 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield now 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the seamen's bill has had quite a history. There has been quite a lot of agitation, there has been quite a deal of interest manifested in this particular measure. The bill that was sent over by Senator LA FOLLETTE in most of its features met with my approval, and I believe it meets with the approval of those who seek safety at sea and who seek to benefit the seamen, those who are engaged in work on vessels upon the ocean. I know that bill S. 136 suits them better than the substitute we are now considering, but after the London conference, and after great and careful consideration on the part of the chairman of this committee and the committee, it was deemed advisable to materially amend the safety provisions as well as other features of the La Follette bill, which is, in fact, practically the original Wilson bill, and all sides have agreed, so far as I know, that the best that can be done for all interests at this particular time is for the Members of this House to vote for this bill and pass it, and let it go to conference in the state that it is in. I am quite sure that before the debate is concluded, although it is to be quite brief, a different position will be taken as to foreign vessels, and the argument will be advanced here that this bill instead of favoring foreign nations will offend foreign nations, so that the House will have both sides of the argument to consider, and Members may take their choice of the two arguments. Some will be just as pronounced and as positive as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], who is very learned and experienced in this particular line and whose fighting qualities I very much admire, in stating exactly the opposite argument, so that we will have to determine the matter from the very best judgment of the membership and on the advice of those who have considered the matter.

I believe that it is absolutely essential that we become very positive in the matter of regulating the shipping, by water, of this country. I believe these shipowning interests have had their own way in matters too long and too exclusively, and that the giving to such an interest its own way is injurious to all concerned. I believe the water shipping of this country illustrates that particular proposition. We have our railroads under regulation, and we are proud of our railroad system, and the more we regulate that system and the nearer we get to Government ownership of the railroads the prouder we will be, but the ships of the ocean are not under regulation. They are freer from Government control or the authority of any Government than any other industry, and the result is that this great interest has become the spoiled child of industry. These shipowners come in here and make all kinds of demands from the Government whenever they need help, but at all other times they fly in the face of all regulation, and have little regard or consideration for anything else than the matter of profits. To illustrate, we have now the shipping interest entirely broken down. They have entirely fallen down upon the ocean in the matter of carrying our commerce and our passengers abroad, and they want all kinds of protection and aid. The requests toward paternalism that they are asking now are almost revolutionary when compared with what those gentlemen generally stand for in matters of governmental activity. The rankest socialism these suggestions would be called if they came from an ordinary public man. They want the United States Government to enter into war-risk insurance, and we are going to have to do it, no doubt, because they can not assume the risks incident to the traffic that is assigned them, notwithstanding the fact that in times of peace they have come before this Congress and asked to be relieved of all liability, and have had their requests so nearly granted that the liability laws of this country are such that a ship can go on the ocean, become a wreck, sink to the bottom of the sea, and the owners, no matter how negligent they are, thus oftentimes make actual profit out of their wrecks; even the insurance money for the full value of the ship they are permitted to pocket, notwithstanding valid claims of ordinary liability. They say our laws in this country are not liberal to the shipping interests, but when the Titanic went down in the Atlantic Ocean her liability under British laws was something like $3,000,000, but under American laws only about $96,000, and we had the spectacle of the English officers of that corporation begging for American liability tests rather than English, although it floated the English flag.

In other words, our law provides that when a ship goes down the owner is responsible only for the current freight and passenger charges and for the value of the ship. Of course, if the ship is at the bottom of the sea, it is valueless; and under American laws, which are criminally liberal, that condition prevails. I will refer to this further, later on.

They want us now to go into the Government ownership of a lot of ships; but it is proposed that those ships shall not participate in the coastwise trade. We are going to have to consider these things; and the bill that is offered provides that the United States Government shall invest twenty-five or thirty million dollars, as a starter, in ships for freight and passenger traffic, but that these ships shall not have the right to engage in the coastwise trade, except to the Philippine Islands and certain islands of the Pacific Ocean. That is the kind of arrangements the shipping interest is always asking. The spoiled child of industry, it wants everything in sight.

The other day we passed an emergency law which provided for American registry of certain foreign-built but American-owned ships; but when the bill came back from the Senate it provided that these ships should have the right to take part in coastwise traffic, and this feature was further amended in conference. One would naturally expect an American-owned American-registered ship, carrying the American flag, would have that right; but no, the proposition of admitting those American-owned and American-registered ships to the coastwise traffic brought on such a storm of protest from multimillionaires who own that monopoly that it was defeated in the Senate.

That is the kind of protection the shipowners have been asking all along, and they have been getting that kind of protection, too; but the sailors, the seamen—the men who work upon the ships—have been neglected, and the reason why the seamanship of our country has been degraded, one of the great reasons, is because we accept the standards of foreign nations, because we permit foreign nations to fix the rules under which men may work on the vessels, and then, as they come into our ports, we enforce their laws. The various party platforms adopted last time proclaimed against the arresting of sailors and permitting seamen to be arrested for desertion; this promise was especially implied in the Progressive and Democratic platforms. This bill wipes that mediæval system out and redeems that promise that was made not only by the Democrats but by other parties for a number of years back, and for that reason the bill ought to pass. We are breaking a little bit—not very much, it is true—into the privileges that have always been given to the vessels that sail the ocean. We go to work and chart the seas, and build lighthouses, and make every arrangement to protect them in case of wreck, and then we organize our Navy to protect them against the enemy in all of the ports of the world at public expense.

We license the officers of the vessels, and with every kind of Government aid and the expenditure of Government money we protect the traffic of those vessels; and yet, when it comes to the matter of fixing rates, when it comes to the matter of regulating them, or the matter of saying what kind of rates they shall pay, to say how the ships when in our ports shall be manned, there comes a cry from some who believe we are working an injustice and trying to break down the American merchant marine. The reason why the American merchant marine has been broken down is because we have not established American standards, but have permitted the foreign ships to fix the standard. We permit them to come to our ports with any kind of labor, and if a man quits the vessel and refuses longer to work under the contract under which he has been employed, if he desired to have a little of the freedom that everybody else has under the American flag and under the American Constitution, we use our United States marshals and our courts and the judges upon the benches in our courts to put those men back on the ships or arrest them and put them in jail because they did not want any longer to work under that kind of employment. We have provided in any other employment that a man can quit if he wants to do so, that anywhere else they can select their master, but on a ship they can not. This bill will work a benefit to the seamen of the country in wiping out that practice. I believe the requirements here as to safety will be such as will make the American ships more safe, and if we enforce these rules and enforce them in our ports as to the carrying of lifeboats and the way they have to be manned, we will be able to maintain for American ships a standard and get for them the shipping and passenger traffic that they will not get in any other way.

It is futile to say a ship because it flies some other flag can do as it pleases in our ports. We do not allow anybody else to do as he pleases in our ports simply because he is a foreigner. We require the foreigner to obey our laws. We require foreign nations to recognize our sovereignty when they come here, and when these shipowners come and advertise for passengers, when they propose to take Americans abroad, they ought to be required to leave our ports under a standard of safety established by our sense of right and our sense of justice. We ought to stand in all cases for American standards, because foreign nations are able to employ men and make contracts that are not recognized under our Constitution. We have found that American shipowners are very patriotic until it comes to the proposition of profit. When it is found that an American ship can make a little bit more by going under the Japanese flag or the Russian flag or the Belgian flag they at once forget their patriotism, the shipowner forgets the land of his birth, forgets his obligation to his native land, dries up about Old Glory and "my flag and your flag," and runs up a foreign flag because he can make more pennies by hiring men who do not have the privileges of American liberty and the American Constitution. Are we, as an American Nation, going to enforce that kind of unconstitutional, revolting, and outrageous—except to toll takers—arrangements? Not at all. We are going to require Mr. Shipowner to obey our laws while in our ports, or else stay out.

Under the privilege of extension in the RECORD I desire to discuss further some of the privileges which I believe are unjustly granted to shipowners, and to emphasize the necessity of going further along several lines not touched by this bill.

The "twilight zone" between State and Federal authority has been so narrowed by recent laws and public sentiment that special interests do not find so safe a retreat within its boundaries. The authority of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution is finding expression and enforcement in Federal statutes that effectively interfere with the operation of some of those who have prospered most as denizens of this zone.

There is another area over which the authority of the Federal Government is unquestioned that has become a refuge—a sort of bad man's realm—where privilege stalks unbridled and unrestrained. Big business in interstate commerce has been made to yield to Federal control. The great railroad system, with its more than 260,000 miles of road and its $20,000,000,000 of stocks and bonds, has been humbled before the majesty and power of the law, and that gigantic organization must await the order of the people through the Interstate Commerce Commission. A Federal employers' liability law took from the railroad its defenses against liability for the injuries of employees, and before long we will have a Federal workman's compensation law that will further protect the employees, or, in case of death, their dependents, in case of injuries in interstate commerce on land.

But "the mighty main" has become a haven of privilege. The moment one becomes an employee on a launch, a barge, a tugboat, a steamship, or an ocean vessel, or in any navigable waters, he must look to the admiralty court and the Federal law, if there is any, for his protection. Of course, if there is no law governing his case, he can resort to State law under certain conditions.

NO COMPENSATION FOR DEATH THROUGH NEGLIGENCE.

If an employer through negligence injures an employee so as to maim him or cause him pain and suffering, he must pay such damages as are assessed by due process of law, but if an employer through negligence kills an employee there shall be no recovery. What do you think of that kind of law?

That used to be the law all over the civilized world. It is now and, to the time "beyond which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," has been the common law of England. It was the law in the United States until statutes were passed creating a right of action in favor of dependents for loss of life through negligence on land. Louisiana in a sense is an exception to the rule, for that State has never been subjected to common law.

There is a Federal employers' liability law that changes the rule, but the framers of that act were particular to limit its scope to deaths and injuries by common carriers by railroad. An interstate common carrier by steamboat or by any other means does not come under its provisions. It has no application to the sea. State laws are limited in application to their own territorial jurisdictions. Then it follows that there is no American law for recovery for death at sea or on the navigable waters of the United States, except in so far as it is to be found in State statutes.

ENGLAND SUBSTITUTED STATUTE GIVING COMPENSATION FOR COMMON LAW.

As long ago as 1846 England enacted the Lord Campbell's act, which supplanted the common law in this regard both in England and on English vessels at sea, for there is no territorial restrictions in that act. A ship flying an English flag is a part of English territory, and Lord Campbell's act has always applied to English ships at sea as well as in inland waters.

Why is it that our Congress has failed to pass an act providing for such liability and has permitted this spoiled child of industry to have its way so long? As early as 1851, under the leadership of Senator Hamlin, of Maine, there was forced through the Senate a few days before adjournment the indefensible act for limiting the liability of shipowners to the value of the ship and the pending freight charges. Senator Hamlin explained that it was merely an act to make American law gibe with English statutes on the same subject. When the act was finally approved, however, it was much more liberal than the English statute in that it based the liability of the shipowner on the value of the ship at the termination of the voyage, while the English liability was based on value before the injury or loss. Of course, where the ship goes down it has no value at the termination of the voyage—that is, after it reaches the bottom.

CONGRESS HAS TAKEN GOOD CARE OF SHIPOWNERS' LIABILITY.

But this was a limitation of liability, not a creation of liability. The purpose of this act was to improve the conditions, to increase the profits, of shipowners. It had no consideration for the human rights of passengers and seamen. There was one redeeming feature about the statute as passed—it was especially exempted from application to rivers and inland waters. But in 1886 they passed an amendatory act making this outrageous liability statute "apply to all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, including canal boats, barges, and lighters."

In the debate when the original act was passed it was stated repeatedly that it was necessary to adopt the measure to put our shipping on an equal basis with that of England. Of course, that was not true at any time; but when the amendment was enacted extending its provisions to smaller vessels engaged in inland navigation, of course, no such excuse could be offered.

NO CONSIDERATION GIVEN BY CONGRESS TO HUMAN SAFETY AND LIABILITY.

While all this legislation was being enacted to help protect profits, no consideration was given for the human rights of those involved. The American lawmakers ignored Lord Campbell's act of 1846, which provided for damages to dependents for death at sea.

Under Lord Campbell's act the English seamen or the passengers had the benefit of jury trial, but our lawmakers did not subject American shipowners to any such burden. A more recent compensation act has further advanced the status of English seamen, but our Congress has not given consideration to this side of the case.

RELIEF THROUGH STATE LAWS AND COURT DECISIONS.

The general proposition of the sovereignty of the ship's flag is well laid down in Lindstrom v. International Navigation Co. (123 Fed., 475), Judge Wallace speaking for the circuit court:

> The territorial sovereignty of a State extends to a vessel of the State when it is upon the high seas, the vessel being deemed a part of the territory of the State to which it belongs; and it follows that a State statute which creates a liability or authorizes a recovery for the consequences of a tortious act operates as efficiently upon the vessel of a State when it is beyond its boundaries as it does when it is physically within the State.

I have already mentioned the fact that practically every American State had passed a law supplanting the common law and creating liability to dependents for death through negligence, and it can readily be seen that if this sovereignty of the flag doctrine could be made applicable to an American State then there would be a remedy, notwithstanding the failure of Congress to act, for every American ship is registered at some American port and every American port is a part of some American State, and every American State has a law creating this liability.

This question came up time and again in Federal courts until finally Judge Addison Brown, of the United States District Court of the Southern District of New York, reviewed the precedents in a learned opinion and gave personal judgment in a libel suit for a death which occurred on the navigable waters of the State of New York, basing his judgment on a New York State death statute. A little later Judge William H. Taft rendered judgment for like cause, basing his findings on a Canadian statute, the death having occurred in Canadian waters and Canada having a death statute. These cases were within territorial waters. Later two Delaware vessels collided off the coast of Virginia. Five passengers and three mariners were drowned. Suit was brought under the Delaware statute on the ground that these ships were legally a part of the State of Delaware, although they were at the time on the high seas. The contention was sustained and judgment rendered, and it has become the established policy of the courts to apply State statutes in such cases.

NOW THE SHIPOWNERS WANT A FEDERAL STATUTE.

The State laws are inconsistent one with the other, and there are a multiplication of complications that may arise, but the shipowners are now willing to cooperate in the enactment of a Federal death statute. I believe Congress should not take any action till an act can be passed that measures up to present standards. I interposed an objection to a proposed makeshift recently and prevented its passing the House by unanimous consent.

The act should be a Federal workman's compensation act for all carriers, both by water and rail, which, of course, would include a provision for compensation in case of death. The present complications between State and Federal jurisdiction are, to say the least of it, very exasperating. The un-American and inhuman liability statutes have already been referred to, but court rules authorized by these statutes are very much against the interest of the claimants in the application of the State statutes. It would seem that if State laws can be applied the right of jury trial would follow. Jury trial, though permissible in certain cases, is rarely granted in an admiralty court. It breaks the shipowner's heart to have to face a jury; he likes the ordinary assessment of damages by a Federal judge so much better than by jurors in a State court, so now he wants a Federal act.

Rules 54 and 56 in admiralty, prescribed by the Federal court under authority of Congress, do about as much enacting as the statutes themselves. These rules provide that when a shipowner shall file suit to limit his liability in an admiralty court the judge of such court may at once stop all pending suits against him in any other court in the United States and order them all assembled before him, and he may issue an injunction prohibiting any person from suing the shipowner before any judge but himself. This, of course, enables the shipowner to pick his judge and then compel all claimants to bring their claims to the forum thus selected and abide the decrees or await orders of this particular judge, including all delays for appeals to higher courts touching the question of limiting liability. By this injunction process this Federal judge in admiralty is enabled to supersede all other judicial forums wherein claimants may have preferred to file their claims. And, of course, the liability decree of the admiralty court is binding on all parties.

These court rules add to the statute matter which no doubt Congress would have refused to enact, notwithstanding the rush of a last day of emergency and unanimous-consent legislation such as was going on when Senator Hamlin put through his liability statute. By this court rule the extraordinary writ of injunction is conferred to supersede all other State or Federal jurisdiction. Congress would have spurned a statute providing for such an injunction, but an admiralty judge passed the necessary legislation in his study.

THE "TITANIC" AVOIDS ENGLISH JUSTICE.

The pending cases against the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.) for loss of life and property on the Titanic, to which I have already referred, illustrates the injustice both of this limitation of liability statute and the injunction against other suits provided by enactment of the Federal judge through the rules of court.

The incidents connected with the Titanic disaster are fresh in the minds of all. The Titanic, a ship of British register, was built in Belfast and launched in 1911 under the ownership and control of the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.), also known as the White Star Line. On April 10, 1912, the Titanic, with passengers and cargo on board, left Southampton on her maiden voyage bound for New York. On April 14, at about 11.40 p. m., in midocean, latitude 41 degrees 46 minutes north and longitude 50 degrees 14 minutes west, the ship came into collision with an iceberg, and at 2.20 a. m. on April 15, 1912, she sank, a complete loss, except 14 lifeboats, which were saved. Seven hundred and eleven persons of her crew and passenger list were saved and a large number perished, as well as her entire cargo, including freight, baggage, and mails.

THE "TITANIC" OWNERS ARE SUED IN MANY COURTS.

In due course a large number of suits and claims were filed against the owners of this vessel in American courts. These complainants sought to hold the Titanic owners under the law of the flag, but the English company became very American all of a sudden.

There is an English liability law governing shipowners, but even the reputed selfishness of John Bull had not permitted any such liability limitation as the United States had provided. The British act provides a limitation of £15 per ton of ship and cargo. In the case of the Titanic English liability law would render the owners of the vessel liable for an amount aggregating $3,000,000. The American statute would limit the liability to $96,000, plus the value of the Titanic, as it now lies at the bottom of the ocean, and allow the English company to pocket the insurance for the full value of the vessel.

The Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.) had offices in several cities of this country, and hoping to apply the English statute, as the Taft decision had applied Canadian law, proceedings had been brought against the owners for damages sustained by reason of the Titanic disaster, as follows:

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York: By Louise Robins, as administratrix, and so forth, of George Robins, deceased, for damages for loss of the life of George Robins.

In the supreme court, New York County, N. Y.: By Frederick W. Shellard, as administrator, and so forth, of Frederick B. Shellard, deceased, for damages for loss of the life of Frederick B. Shellard.

In the superior court, Cook County, Ill.: By John Devine, as administrator, and so forth, of A. Willard, deceased, for damages for the loss of life of A. Willard.

In the district court, Ramsey County, Minn.: By Carl Johnson, for damages for alleged personal injuries sustained and for loss of baggage. By Oscar Hedman, for damages for alleged personal injuries and for loss of baggage.

ENGLISH DEFENDANTS CHOOSE THE COURT AND NAME THE JUDGE.

Of course, the wise English shipowners did not want these American passengers and employees and their dependents to carry on these proceedings in these several American courts. Why, they would have jury trials there just like they have in England—quick trials, too. They have already had their trials before juries in England and judgments paid long ago.

They naturally wanted all such cases tried in some court of their own selection, before some judge of their own selection, and, of course, without a jury. They wanted the court domiciled in a convenient place. They preferred the hill to come to Mahomet rather than for Mahomet to go to the hill, and they could go Mahomet one better, for they could have their way and Mahomet could not. They selected a Federal judge who has recently withdrawn from the bench because he could not afford to lose his lucrative practice any longer.

Then they wanted American liability law applied, if possible, so as to let them off on $96,000 liability rather than English law, with $3,000,000.

All of a sudden, like a bolt of lightning out of a clear sky, these litigants and all other claimants that can be found, and, of course, the shipowning company had the whole list, were searched out by a United States marshal, and an order of this learned Federal judge of the Southern District of New York is served upon them, each and every one, and they are commanded to quit suing these English shipowners in any court but that of the said judge. And all who have not yet commenced suit are ordered to come before this particular judge with their complaint. Here we have the spectacle of an English corporation which has already been compelled by a jury in England to pay up English claims compelling American citizens on American soil to go across the country to a forum of its own selection to have their cases tried. Congress could not have been forced to pass such a law, but the court's rules were sufficient.

THE STANDARD OF LIABILITY SHOULD BE IDENTICAL ON SEA AND LAND.

The United States Supreme Court has finally ruled on this case, and decided that American liability law is to be applied, and not English liability law. This decision makes it so much more imperative that the antiquated and uncivilized standards of American liability for shipowners be abandoned and the same standard applied on the water as on the land. It is absurd to hold jury trial as an inestimable boon of liberty in civil disputes on the land, but deny it in disputes arising on the water. The seaman's bill is designed to free sailors and seamen from arrest for desertion. A farm hand can quit and work in a sawmill or a factory if he wants to. Why should a human being working on a boat have less privilege?

The day of wiping out this haven of lawless big business on the mighty main is at hand. It is imperative that the legislation be enacted, not by the shipping rings and the steamboat companies but by those who get their orders from the people direct. There is pending now in the National House of Representatives a bill, introduced by me, House bill 12807, which would extend the principle of the employers' liability law so it would apply to all the jurisdiction of the United States, whether on land or water. There is no reason why it should be restricted to interstate commerce by railroad, as is now the case. I ask for the help of the public in the passage of this bill. It is now before the Judiciary Committee.

There is pending an absurd shipowners' bill for compensation in case of death at sea—House bill 6143. It is a lame attempt. It harks back to days of uncivilized industrial conditions and ought not to have a moment's consideration. Yet it was presented in the most plausible way, indorsed by leading proctors in admiralty and the American Bar Association. It would probably have passed the House recently by unanimous consent except for my persistent objection. One section of this shipowners' bill for relief from the effect of State laws now in force reenacts and reaffirms the present infamous liability protection for shipowners. Another section provides for damages for "pecuniary loss sustained" only. Another section protects the shipowner with the doctrine of "comparative negligence." Another section shuts out jury trial by forcing all such cases exclusively into admiralty courts. Before such a relic of barbarism could be enforced on the railroad employees of this country there would be a revolution. Yet the shipowners will do their best to put through Congress just such a makeshift.

I am unalterably opposed to ship subsidies. I do not believe in holding up one man for the benefit of another. I believe President Wilson has discovered the real germ, he has the bug that causes all the trouble, when he puts his hands on the steamboat owners' profit. I want Government ownership of the coastwise traffic. I want a Federal monopoly; but I want the Government to collect the freights and the fares, as well as to bear all the expenses and assume all the risks. I have introduced a bill that really means Government ownership of vessels. It would help shippers and manufacturers by transporting our goods to South America at cost. Steamboat owners' profits would be at an end, and our labor would be benefited by increasing the exports and the volume of the manufactured goods. Our trade would be wonderfully extended in South America if my bill were adopted. It involves humane conditions and carries the provisions of the seamen's bill, which are needed in order to do simple justice.

The plan for the Government to invest in vessels and then forbid these Government owned and operated vessels from carrying freight from port to port and from ocean to ocean in our coastwise trade is an unthinkable proposition, and will surely have all the opposition I can give it.

The bill I have introduced is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18313) to authorize the President of the United States to acquire, own, operate, and maintain an American merchant marine.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed, without unnecessary delay, to purchase, lease, construct, or acquire, either by purchase of stock of owning or controlling corporations or otherwise, such vessels as may be necessary to handle such portions of the coastwise passenger and freight traffic of the United States and of the Great Lakes and between ports on the Western Hemisphere as may be induced to ship or take passage on such vessels so acquired.

SEC. 2. That such vessels as may be acquired under this act shall be operated by the United States Government under such schedules, rules, and regulations as may be provided subject to the terms of this act: Provided, That the rates and schedules shall be so fixed and regulated from time to time, as near as may be possible, to pay all expenses of operation and create a sinking fund of not less than 2½ per cent of the total investment of the United States in such vessels and other necessary equipment until all of said investment is repaid into the United States Treasury, together with 3 per cent interest on such sum.

SEC. 3. That no privately owned vessel hereafter constructed or registered under the laws of the United States shall engage in the coastwise traffic of the United States, except traffic in inland waters (not the Great Lakes) or between such ocean ports or ports on the Great Lakes as in the opinion of the commission created by this act the United States Government is not prepared to operate or where such private operation may be deemed advisable by such commission. In all such cases license for such operation shall be given in writing: Provided, That this act shall have no reference whatever to traffic on inland waters except the Great Lakes, it being the purpose of this act to establish and maintain a Government owned and operated monopoly of all coastwise and Great Lakes shipping between ports of the United States in the Western Hemisphere and of all other shipping on American vessels between ports in the Western Hemisphere: Provided further, That the rights of vessels now engaged in such traffic shall be preserved until such vessels are acquired by the United States, or shall cease to be seaworthy, under such laws or rules and regulations as may be or become applicable from time to time.

SEC. 4. That in time of war, whether the United States Government be directly involved therein or not, the President shall have the right and authority to transfer any vessel to the Navy for such use as may be deemed necessary.

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the service provided for by this act such vessels of the Navy as, in his discretion, are available from time to time without impairment of the paramount duties of the Navy and are appropriate for such service.

SEC. 6. That the said vessels and the entire service provided for by this act shall be managed and controlled by a commission, to consist of the President, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of the Navy. The entire service shall be known as the American Marine Transportation Service, and the said commission shall have authority to sue and be sued under said designation. Said commission shall designate a chief, subject to removal by the said board, who shall have no power or duty other than the operation of the service herein provided. The duties of inspection, supervision, fixing of rates, schedules, and wages, and all rules and regulations authorized or provided for by this act shall devolve upon the said chief, acting under authority of the said commission.

SEC. 7. That all operations under this act shall be governed by further provisions, as set forth in this section:

The hours of labor of all persons employed shall not exceed 48 per week, save in emergencies wherein life or property is in imminent danger.

A minimum wage scale shall be fixed by the commission herein provided, and no wage shall be paid upon a scale of hourly wages lower than the minimum wage scale fixed by the President, as provided in this act.

No person under the age of 16 years shall be employed for any purpose.

SEC. 8. That the commission shall make general rules and regulations—

To insure the safety of operatives employed in the enterprises provided for in this act.

To provide for detailed reports upon all accidents or occupational diseases.

To provide for just and reasonable compensation in the case of all operatives in any enterprise who may be injured or killed or who may contract any occupational disease in the course of their work, without regard to negligence of such operative, in any case where compensation shall inure to the benefit of dependents.

To provide for a system of insurance of operatives employed under this act in cases of sickness, injury, or death.

To provide for an adequate system of sanitation, housing, and general living conditions for the operatives engaged under this act.

To carry out and enforce the provisions and ultimate purpose of this act, said purpose being to provide transportation of freight and passengers at the lowest price consistent with the maintenance of the welfare of all operatives, the stimulation of efficient service, and the maximum and at the same time most economical utilization of said properties.

SEC. 9. That in all vessels of the service therein provided of more than 100 tons gross the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen, oilers, and water tenders into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty alternately for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel, and seamen serving in one department of a vessel shall not be required to do duty in another department; but these provisions shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy. While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays, but this shall not prevent the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage; and at all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor, nine hours, inclusive of the anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work.

SEC. 10. That the masters of all vessels shall pay to each seaman his wages within two days after the termination of the agreement under which he was shipped, or at the time such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in case of vessels making foreign voyages, or from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, within 24 hours after the cargo has been discharged, or within four days after the seaman has been discharged, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall be entitled to be paid at the time of his discharge on account of wages a sum equal to one-third part of the balance due him.

SEC. 11. That every seaman shall be entitled to receive, within 48 hours after demand therefor, from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the wages which shall be due him at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended; and all stipulations to the contrary shall be void. And when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due him under such conditions as are applicable to payment of wages to other Government employees.

SEC. 12. That on all merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of less than 100 tons register, every place appropriated to the crew of the vessel shall have a space of not less than 100 cubic feet and not less than 16 square feet, measured on the floor or deck of that place, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein, and each seaman shall have a berth for his exclusive use, and not more than one berth shall be placed one above another; such place or lodging shall be securely constructed, properly lighted, drained, heated, and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvium of cargo or bilge water. And every such crew space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of the crew occupying said place in use during the voyage.

All merchant vessels of the United States, the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, having more than 10 men on deck must have for the use of the sailors at least one light, clean, and properly ventilated washing place. There shall be provided at least one washing outfit for every 2 men of the watch. The washing place shall be properly heated. A separate washing place shall be provided for the firemen and engine-room men, if their number exceed 10, which shall be large enough to accommodate at least one-sixth of them at the same time, and have hot and cold water supply and a sufficient number of washbasins, sinks, and shower baths.

SEC. 13. That whenever any seaman who has been lawfully engaged or any apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offenses he shall be punished as follows:

First. For desertion, by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two days' pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute.

Third. For quitting the vessel, without leave, after her arrival at the port of her delivery and before she is placed in security, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than one month's pay.

Fourth. For willful disobedience to any lawful command at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture from his wages of not more than four days' pay, or, at the discretion of the court having legal jurisdiction, by imprisonment for not more than one month.

Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than 3 months, at the discretion of the court having legal jurisdiction.

Sixth. For assaulting any master or mate, by imprisonment for not more than two years.

Seventh. For willfully damaging the vessel, or embezzling or willfully damaging any of the stores or cargo, by forfeiture out of his wages of a sum equal in amount to the loss thereby sustained, and also, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than 12 months.

Eighth. For any act of smuggling for which he is convicted he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period of not more than 12 months.

Ninth. In no case shall any seaman be imprisoned, except while at sea, and until the vessel arrives at its home port, except by due process of law, which shall include jury trial.

SEC. 14. That flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section, it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable.

That it shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages he may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or children, under such regulations as may be established by the proper officer, and no wages due or accruing under this act shall be subject to attachment or arrestment.

SEC. 15. That the crews of all vessels, as near as may be practical, shall be American citizens who speak the English language, but in no case shall any vessel have on board a crew less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to speak the English language, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers, are of a rating not less than able seaman: Provided, That every such vessel carrying passengers shall be provided and equipped with a sufficient number of seaworthy lifeboats to carry and transport at one time every passenger and every member of the crew licensed to be carried on board such vessel and that she shall have a sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seaman or higher, who shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of lifeboats under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce: Provided further, That the board of supervising inspectors be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, to be approved by the Secretary of Commerce, to provide, in harbor and at sea, for lifeboat drill and fire drill to be held for the training of the crew in fighting fire, in abandoning the vessel, and in caring for the passengers.

No person shall be rated as an able seaman unless he is 19 years of age or upward and has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes. Any person may make application to any board of local inspectors for a certificate of service as able seaman, and upon proof being made to said board by affidavit, under rule approved by the Secretary of Commerce, showing the nationality of the applicant and the vessel or vessels on which he has had service and that he has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes, the board of local inspectors shall issue to said applicant a certificate of service, which shall be retained by him and be accepted as prima facie evidence of his rating as an able seaman.

Each board of local inspectors shall keep a complete record of all certificates of service issued by them and to whom issued and shall keep on file the affidavits upon which said certificates are issued.

SEC. 16. That vessels under the service herein provided shall, except as herein provided, be subject to the laws and rules of navigation affecting privately owned merchant vessels of the United States of America.

SEC. 17. That the sum of $25,000,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in the discretion of the commission created by this act, for the purpose of acquiring such vessels and incurring such expenses as may be deemed necessary in organizing, inaugurating, and carrying on the service provided for in this act and in defraying the operating expenses incident thereto: Provided, That all money received for the transportation of passengers and freight, and from all other sources incident to the operation of the said line or lines, is hereby made available, in addition to the aforesaid sum of $25,000,000 herein appropriated, for expenses incident to the establishing and conducting of the business contemplated in this act: Provided further, That any sum of money herein appropriated which remains unexpended at the end of the fifth fiscal year after the passage of this act, and at the end of each fiscal year thereafter, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who speak on the bill may have leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all who speak on this bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CANTOR].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the only way to earn your salary is to be here. I think the audience is small, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that there is no quorum present; evidently there is not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 291 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CANTOR].

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Speaker, during the past few days meetings have been held in New York attended by many of the leading exporters of manufactured articles, and all of them doing business in foreign countries. They have had under consideration the question of the moratorium which has been declared by those countries now engaged in armed conflict. This renders it impossible for these merchants to secure payment of the moneys due them by residents of those countries, while they are compelled to pay all their obligations due abroad.

The result of these meetings was the adoption unanimously of a resolution which I have been requested to present to this House and which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

We are informed that foreign acceptances payable in England, France, or Germany are subject to the provisions of the moratoriums promulgated in these countries, respectively, if the acceptances were made before the moratoriums became effective; and we are also informed that the moratorium operates to extend the due date of the draft until the expiration of the extension provided for thereunder, and that payments can not be made until such expiration.

We have been advised by counsel and by leading domestic bankers, and it is the sense of this meeting, that such drafts or acceptances must be regarded as not maturing until the expiration of the extension under the moratorium, and that payment before that date can not be made or required. Payment of such drafts can not in any event be safely made except upon the surrender of the original draft.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of extreme importance to many of our business men engaged heavily in the export trade. It is impossible to estimate how many millions of dollars are due these merchants upon which they had a right to rely for the payment of their own obligations, both here and abroad. It was suggested that our Government also declare a moratorium similar in character to those declared abroad; but it is a question whether we have the right under the Constitution to do it or whether it would be a wise policy for the United States to pursue, even if we had the right to do so. It is possible that the individual States would have the right, but it is almost clear to me that the Federal Government did not possess the power. It was for these reasons that I have hesitated to introduce a resolution or bill in this House in relation to this subject, and for the additional reason that being a question of national policy of almost the highest character, the matter would more justly and properly belong to some other department of our Government. I do not believe that the emergency is great enough now to warrant such action. I ask that the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee for such consideration or action as it may deem proper.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, during the Sixty-second Congress when the seamen's bill was before the House I then supported that measure, and have been in favor and am in favor of the seamen's bill at this time.

I shall vote for this substitute because it agrees with the Senate bill in changing the status of the seamen from that of serfdom to freedom. Altogether too long have we maintained laws that come to us from the early Middle Ages that are at variance with the concepts inculcated by modern education and at variance with our own fundamental law. Our own countrymen began quitting the sea more than 50 years ago, and for a long period of years we have been dependent upon European nations not only for our sailors and firemen, but also for officers to man our merchant vessels.

The same underlying cause that has discouraged seamanship here in the United States has of late years seized upon and is doing the same thing in European countries. The underlying cause is the same in all. The results flowing from it are the same, and as the white man is quitting the sea the oriental is employed already to such extent that a very large number of cargo-carrying vessels coming to our ports are manned by men from India, China, and the Malay Islands.

The breaking out of the present European war and what has taken place in our own ports indicate clearly the want of wisdom for any nation in depending upon alien races and alien nationalities in the manning of their merchant vessels. All the vessels held in our ports by the war are in one way or another seeking to get rid of such of their men as are alien in nationality and race, and this shows how unfortunate would be our own position if at any time we should be placed in a position in which we must depend upon our own people. The policy followed for nearly a hundred years has been such as to discourage both capital and labor from seeking the sea.

The ocean is free except for such combinations as are formed, and the competition will under normal conditions deliver the world's freight-carrying business into the hands of those who can do it cheapest. The indispensable condition for the participation in any over-sea commerce, therefore, is equal cost of construction, equal cost of operation. Excepting some obstructions which I expect to see removed in the conference, my opinion is that the passage of this bill will equalize the cost of operation.

There is, however, a more compelling, because a moral, reason for the enactment of this legislation. This is expressed in the following petition, which was adopted by the seamen of the United States in December, 1909, and by the representatives of the organized seamen of Europe at an international conference held at Copenhagen in August, 1910:

To those who govern nations, to those who make the laws, to humanitarians, democrats, Christians, and friends of human freedom everywhere, do we, the seamen, the yet remaining bondmen, humbly yet earnestly submit this our petition, that we be made free men, and that the blighting disgrace of bondage be removed from our labor, which once was considered honorable, which is yet needed in the world of commerce, and which has been held to be of great importance to nations with seacoasts to defend.

Existing maritime law makes of us seamen, excepting in the domestic trade of the United States, the property of the vessel on which we sail. We can not work as seamen without signing a contract which brings us under the law. This contract is fixed by law or authorized by Governments. We have nothing to do with its terms. We either sign it and sail, or we sign it not and remain landsmen.

When signing this contract, we surrender our working power to the will of another man at all times while the contract runs. We may not, on pain of penal punishment, fail to join the vessel. We may not leave the vessel, though she is in perfect safety. We may not, without our master's permission, go to a mother's sick bed or funeral, or attend to any other duties of a son, brother, a Christian, or a citizen, excepting in the domestic trade of the United States.

If the owner thinks he has reason to fear that we desire to escape, he may, without judicial investigation, cause us to be imprisoned for safe-keeping until he shall think proper to take us out. If we have escaped, he may publish our personal appearance along with a reward for our apprehension and return. He may, through contracts between nations, cause the peace officers and police to aid him in recovering his property. The captain may change, the owner may change—we are sold with the vessel—but so long as the flag does not change, there is nothing except serious illness or our master's pleasure that will release us from the vessel.

The master, acting for the vessel, may release himself and the vessel by paying a few dollars, with no alternative.

He that owns another man's labor power owns his body, since the two can not be separated.

We stand in the same relation to the vessel as the serf did to the estate, as the slave to his master. When serfdom was abolished in western Europe we were forgotten by the liberators and our status remained. When the slaves of the United States and Brazil were emancipated our status continued. When serfdom was abolished in Russia no change came to us.

We now raise our manacled hands in humble supplication and pray that the nations issue a decree of emancipation and restore to us our right as brother men; to our labor that honor which belonged to it until your power, expressing itself through your law, set upon it the brand of bondage in the interest of cheap transportation by water.

We respectfully submit that the serfdom of the men in our calling is of comparatively modern origin. Earlier maritime law bound, while in strange countries and climes, the seaman to his shipmates and the ship, and the ship to him, on the principle of common hazard. In his own country he was free—the freest of men. We further humbly submit that, as the consciousness of the seaman's status penetrates through the population, it will be impossible to get freemen to send their sons into bondage or to induce freemen's sons to accept it, and we, in all candor, remind you that you, when you travel by water, expect us—the serfs—to exhibit in danger the highest qualities of freemen by giving our lives for your safety.

At sea the law of common hazard remains. There must be discipline and self-sacrifice, but in any harbor the vessel and you are safe, and we beseech you give to us that freedom which you claim for yourself and which you have bestowed on others, to the end that we may be relieved of that bitterness of soul that is the heavy burden of him who knows and feels that his body is not his own.

On the subject of safety at sea the bill is not satisfactory, but I have faith that the committee of conference will so improve this measure as to make it more like the Senate bill, and thus make it more conservative, more practical in its operation, and more tending to the safety of the traveling public. On this subject I desire to put into the RECORD a resolution that was adopted by the Consumers' League when it met here in Washington, and which has been indorsed by a very large number of similar organizations throughout the country.

Whereas it has become clearly evident that passenger vessels which will not sink or burn are not now and can not be built; and

Whereas the several nations have up to the present failed to provide an adequate number of seaworthy lifeboats for all persons on board with a sufficient number of real seamen to manage such boats; and

Whereas the loss of the Titanic, with nearly 1,600 lives, furnished conclusive proof that shipowners will accept more passengers than can be given any protection in emergencies, and that national regulations, both as to lifeboats and men, were then wholly inadequate; and

Whereas the loss of life in the burning of the Volturno furnished additional proof by showing an insufficient number of real seamen to manage the lifeboats on board of her; and

Whereas the loss of life caused by the sinking of the Monroe proves that nothing effective has so far been done, either by the Governments or the shipowners themselves, to properly care for the safety of passengers; and

Whereas the London conference on safety of life at sea made recommendations in some instances ineffective, in other instances legalizing existing unsafe practices; and

Whereas the number of persons permitted to be carried by vessels in the domestice passenger trade being subjected to the unrestricted discretion of the United States inspectors has resulted in the vessels being so crowded with passengers that according to the shipowners' testimony they can not carry lifeboats for all persons on board; and

Whereas the Supervising Inspector General in explaining the policy of the Steamboat Inspection Service admitted that only 8 or 9 square feet on deck for each passenger is all that is generally allowed on excursion steamers, and that vessels while within 5 miles from shore, but any distance from harbor, may sail with 3,600 passengers, although having lifeboats for only 90 persons and rafts for only 270 persons. The "safety" offered the other 3,240 people is, in case of fire or sinking, under present regulations, to put on life preservers, take their children in their arms, and jump overboard; and

Whereas the La Follette bill for safety of life at sea, which passed the United States Senate on the 23d of October last, provides seaworthy lifeboats for all persons on board and a crew sufficient to man each lifeboat with at least two able seamen or men of higher rating—surely reasonable and conservative safety provisions—is now being resisted in its passage through the House of Representatives by the combined influence of American and European shipping companies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge upon Congress the immediate passage of the La Follette bill for safety of life at sea, and that pending such measure we advise the public to refrain from any but necessary travel by water; and be it further

Resolved, That we advise those who must travel, either on the ocean or on the Great Lakes, to carefully investigate the equipment and manning of passenger vessels, comparing the same with the standard set by the La Follette seamen bill, before purchasing tickets.

This resolution was adopted before the loss of the Empress of Ireland, the loss of which seems to me to furnish the absolute proofs of untrustworthiness of the contentions of those who oppose proper safety legislation. The loss took place near the mouth of the river, but little over a mile from shore; the wireless was working until she sank; help came within two hours, and yet more than 1,000 people were drowned.

Keeping in mind that the purpose of this legislation is threefold—namely, to give freedom to the seamen, promote safety at sea, and to promote the growth of an American merchant marine by equalizing the cost of operation of foreign and American vessels trading from and to American ports—it must be said that this substitute will not accomplish the purposes intended in the way that it ought to.

It is to be hoped and expected that the conferees of the Senate and the House together will succeed in agreeing to a report which will finally make a practical, workable, efficient law.

The differences between the Senate bill and the committee substitute are of such nature that there is ample opportunity for an agreement such as will accomplish the purposes intended and results desired. I have confidence that the conferees will come to such understanding and agreement or I should very seriously hesitate voting for the bill.

The two bills are alike in this, that they repeal statutes and provide a means of abrogating or amending treaties under which American seamen are arrested, detained, and surrendered back to their vessels under treaties with foreign nations, and under which the United States arrests, detains, and delivers to their vessels any foreign seamen who may desert—that is, violate their contract to labor—within the jurisdiction of the United States. They are further alike in this, that the seamen on foreign vessels in American ports and American seamen in foreign ports have a right to demand and receive one-half of the wages earned, excepting in this, that the Senate bill provides that the money shall be paid within two days after demand therefor in any port where a vessel loads and discharges cargo, while the substitute has no such provision, but provides that such demand may not be made oftener than every sixth day. Thus the substitute may be so construed that half pay may be withheld until the vessel is about to leave, thus leaving no time to have the right in force.

The Senate bill provides for the absolute prohibition against payment of advance or allotment to original creditor, and makes it applicable to all vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States. The substitute adds the following proviso:

Provided, That treaties in force between the United States and foreign nations do not conflict therewith.

It is to be hoped that the conferees will strike this proviso out, because it will permit some merchant vessels to pay advance in ports of the United States while it will be prohibited to American vessels and to some foreign vessels, and the vessels who have this right will always be able to obtain cheaper crews than those who have not. It is a special privilege conferred upon some nations' vessels that will work to the disadvantage of other nations' vessels, including American vessels, and it is a serious and crying evil, under which the seamen have too long suffered and under which the crimping system has flourished. To strike it out means equalizing the condition to all vessels and to wipe out the crimping system, in so far as American ports are concerned. (Sec. 11, p. 35.)

Section 1 in the Senate bill is sections 1 and 2 in the substitute. Section 2 of the substitute deals with the hours of labor and working conditions, both at sea and in port. The exemption of bays or sounds, on page 22, line 19, will, unless modified or stricken out, permit the undermanning and overworking of a large number of vessels trading along the coast. Bays and sounds are indefinite terms. A bay may be nearly sheltered or wide open to the ocean. It may be small or large. One need but look at the map of the United States to realize that this expression should be stricken out. It was evidently put in to preserve the present working conditions in those places, but the present working conditions has been responsible in the past for such disasters as the General Slocum, the Monroe, and others.

The Senate bill provides there shall be no unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays. The committee substitute provides specific days as holidays, leaving out very many State holidays. This will cause friction that might much better be avoided by permitting to the men the enjoyment of such holidays as shall be celebrated in ports of the United States where the vessel happens to be at the time.

Section 13 of the substitute corresponds to section 12 of the Senate bill. In dealing with individual efficiency the difference between the two does not seem material. But in the matter of safety the difference is so great that I should hesitate to vote for the bill if I did not believe that the committee on conference will deal with this matter from the point of view solely of the safety of the traveling public.

The Senate bill provides lifeboats for all and two able seamen or men of higher rating for each lifeboat. The substitute leaves this matter out of section 13 and introduces a section 14 in which it seems to deal with vessels of the United States. And then it goes on to determine what is a seaworthy lifeboat, what is a proper pontoon raft, the number of boats that are to be carried, the number of rafts that are to be carried, specifying the waters, and treating the open sea differently within the 20-mile limit than outside of the 20-mile limit, permitting vessels within the 20-mile limit a certain time of the year; that is, from May 15 to September 15, to run with 30 per cent of its passengers and crew without either boats or rafts. For the same period it provides 20 per cent of boats, 30 per cent of rafts, and 50 per cent of the passengers to be without either means of safety on the Lakes. And this in spite of the experience of the Monroe, the Empress of Ireland, and the tremendous losses of human life on the Lakes within the last five years.

In place of two able seamen or men of higher rating for each boat, there is on pages 65 and 66, a provision for what is called

"Certificated lifeboat men." This is an innovation on shipboard, so radical and fraught with such consequences, both from the point of view of safety and of discipline, that I look upon it with the greatest apprehension. The preparation and training of the certificated lifeboat men is such that the qualifications may be attained after a week's training in smooth water drilling with an empty boat, manifestly an ineffective preparation for the most difficult and most important of the work that a seaman has to perform, namely, the saving of human life in case of disaster. Industrially and from the point of view of discipline, I feel sure that the burden upon the shipowner will be greater under the substitute than under the Senate bill, and I do hope that both for the sake of safety to the public and expense to the shipowner, the conferees may give to this particular point earnest and painstaking consideration.

On page 67, "a licensed officer or able seaman" is to be placed in charge of every boat or raft. This means that an engineer will be placed in charge of a lifeboat. There is nothing in his work that prepares him for this. It will be done over his protest and to the serious endangering of human life. It should read "a licensed deck officer or able seamen." There surely ought at least to be one man in the boat who is accustomed to the sea and knows enough about it to work with it for the safety of himself and those who are in the boat with him.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOWDLE].

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Speaker, what irony and fatuity seem to preside over some of the efforts of us men. Warring nations are trying to make the sea unsafe, while we are to-day trying to make the sea safe.

The expression "safety at sea" gives us a thrill. We actually think that we, with ink and paper, are the makers of it. We are not. Experience makes such safety, at sea and elsewhere, as may be obtainable, and then the law follows after, declaring to be necessary the thing found to be sensible. In this the law, as usual, is a kind of ex post facto performance—but good at that.

About 90 per cent of all good things in this bill are actually in maritime practice now, as the result of the Titanic disaster—I mean in relation to life-saving apparatus.

But the bill is good simply in that it tends to unify the practices touching safety. The Titanic disaster started this whole subject. The criminal neglect disclosed there aroused the world in never-to-be-forgotten fashion. What happened so startled the companies that in their advertisements and literature they are now careful to accent the fact that "there are lifeboat accommodations for all." The Titanic was a good deal like the individual life; it had everything aboard but lifeboats.

How much safety at sea can we get? Well, compared with the number of persons carried, safety at sea is greater right now than safety on land. Time would fail me to list those companies, commencing with the Cunard Co., which show pompous lists of millions carried and not a life lost. But the two late disasters—Titanic and Empress of Ireland—aroused us. We are now determined to prevent certain negligences which some claim were at the bottom of those accidents.

But, how much safety can be created at sea?

The question really is, What is the best apparatus for saving life when it becomes necessary to abandon the vessel after a disaster? This, I insist, is the real question. But some will say, Why not prevent those accidents just as doctors are trying to prevent disease? Well, everybody is now trying to prevent accidents at sea and elsewhere, and a good deal of progress is being made; but this bill before us has to do with methods of getting away after a disaster; that is, we are trying to make such accidents as are still likely to occur safe accidents.

How to make maritime accidents safe—this is the question. But why not abolish accidents, when we have so much paper and ink still idle?

Let men consider this: We can not abolish fog by law. Icebergs will not melt under the heat of congressional wrath. And great vessels will continue to make records through fogs and mists; and, without making records, vessels will sometimes continue to strike each other amidships and wound themselves in a way that will allow but few to be saved—which was the Empress's case—and such disasters will continue to be fearful and more fearful as we continue to build and use these insane leviathans.

I must pause to nail some widely diffused misstatements in relation to the responsibility for the loss of the Volturno and the Empress of Ireland, done by inexpert and thoroughly irresponsible writers and done for the purpose of reflecting on our committee.

It has been said that the loss of life on the Empress was due to lack of life-saving facilities and lack of competent seamen. The statement is false.

The 800 drowned dead still locked in their staterooms, many of whom did not even awaken, are mute witnesses to this untruth. The boat sank in some nine minutes in 140 feet of water, and when the first passengers got on deck the list was so terrible that the boats were unusable in the main and it was almost impossible to cling to the deck. No amount of apparatus could save life under such appalling conditions. Some persons have aspersed the crew because so many were saved. As the watch was up and vigilant, they were the only men who could have been saved in that rush of water. Indeed, that accident was of a character which actually crushed and killed outright hundreds in their rooms.

There is not a thing in this bill, nor could there be a thing in any bill, which would have prevented what happened to the Empress or her passengers.

As to the Volturno, it has been charged by certain persons that the loss of life there was due simply to lack of competent seamen. This is not true. For hours great liners stood by trying in vain to launch boats in the boisterous sea. Finally some six steamers went to windward of her and formed a wind and wave break. This was quite effective.

When the Kroonland, whose crew Congress has thanked for bravery and seamanship, reached the scene, so great was the danger to those who would attempt to go to the rescue that the captain, instead of ordering his men to go, asked for volunteers, agreeably with the law of the sea. I speak of this simply to indicate that there are times when no boats and no seamanship can prevent disaster, when no congressional enactment can stay the protean hand of destruction of "Old Ocean's grey and melancholy wastes."

I observe, by the way, that Members in this House, in rising to speak, sometimes have a modest way of recommending what they are about to say by telling of whatever peculiar qualification they possess for speaking on this or that subject. Business men always advise us as business men. During the tariff debate manufacturers assured us that they should be listened to because they were manufacturers. Bankers, during the currency debate, gave "an atmosphere of verisimilitude to what was otherwise a bald and unconvincing argument" by saying that they spoke as bankers. Let me therefore emulate them in this wise course, and say that I am familiar with ships and maritime engineering, serving as an apprentice in one of the great shipyards of this country. I know seafaring men and something of seafaring matters, though I have not been to sea; I know ships, their weaknesses, and the dangers which menace them. Men who work around shipyards are usually men who have been to sea in some capacity or other, and though my own modest work was wholly with marine engines, I know the ships which they propel and the accidents which befall them.

When one boards a ship the first thing that impresses him is that the sea is not safe. The great lines of boats in their davits tell him that it may become perfectly convenient to quit the ship.

Entering his stateroom, the life preserver accents the idea he met on the deck, namely, that the ocean has perils.

Wherever he goes he sees evidences of the fact that man, not being an aquatic animal, is in danger at sea—great bilge pumps, fire extinguishers, smoke detectors, hose lines, and a thousand things all say in chorus "On the sea you are in an unnatural position; beware."

But do not lifeboats make the sea safe? By no means, my friend. If lifeboats made the sea safe, it would be well for us to go to Europe in lifeboats. Little boats are not a tithe as safe as big boats at sea. Lifeboats are simply the lesser of two terrible evils—that is all.

A lifeboat is available only under some rather exceptional conditions. For instance:

The disaster to the vessel must be of a character which will allow passengers and crew time to enter the boats without panic.

A vessel struck as was the Empress must involve the death of almost the entire passenger list, no matter what the boatage may be.

The sea must not be too rough to launch the boat.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order fixing the time the only way to get at it would be to ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended.

Mr. BOWDLE. I can finish in five minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the rule the debate is limited to two hours, and I regret very much to object.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes beyond the time which has already been fixed.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It has been adopted by rule, has it not?

The SPEAKER. It has been adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended from 2 hours to 2 hours and 5 minutes, and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOWDLE] have the 5 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BOWDLE. I would like to finish my speech first, please.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. BOWDLE. The season for the accident ought to be summer, for in winter large numbers of boats become in a short time coated with ice, tons of it in fact, so that many of them are unusable. The wind should not be blowing hard, for in addition to making the sea boisterous it makes launching the windward boats impossible.

The accident should not be a collision which carries away, as many accidents do, large numbers of boats.

The accident should not be fire, for this at once renders it impossible to get at many boats.

The accident, if a collision with a berg, should be one in which the berg is side swiped, rather than struck head-on, for this will probably allow time for the boats. But if the impact is head-on every boiler will leave its fastenings, and in an instant of time all decks will be blown off, all boats destroyed, and probably all passengers roasted. This is precisely what would have occurred had the Titanic struck head-on. The 36 mammoth boilers would have accomplished just this.

I have tried to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that the accident at sea, in order to make lifeboats effective, must be an exceedingly polite and proper accident, occurring under fairly good and unusual conditions.

I should like to make accidents at sea and elsewhere as safe as possible, and the boats properly manned are the best we can do, but let us not deceive ourselves with the idea that this or any legislation can make the sea safe.

In trying to make accidents safe, or safer than they are at present, I want to call attention to some facts which must continue to make the accidents which do occur more and more appalling.

The great size of boats tends to danger.

Effective control of the captain becomes impossible in boats of such length.

In the matter of fire at sea we have, with steel ships and steel housings and metal furniture, reduced the danger to a minimum. But this is the internal danger, when the great dangers of which we have been speaking are external dangers, due to fog, collision, stranding, and so forth. And mark you, Mr. Speaker, the reduction of these internal dangers—fire and explosion—has in a very curious way actually increased certain external dangers. Let me explain. In days when everything was wood a sinking vessel left the sea strewn with a vast mass of wreckage, some of it approximating to small rafts. To-day a liner prides herself on almost the entire absence of wood. If the accident to-day precipitates numbers into the water without time for preservers, there is no hope even for swimmers unless the coast is near and safe. Even if preservers can be put on, there is no wreckage from the modern liner's deck which would allow the unfortunate to raise himself sufficiently out of the water for an hour, and thus help him to retain enough heat to support life for that two or three hours within which help might come. What a boon it would have been to the Titanic's passengers if, at that awful moment—a moment whose awfulness is without parallel in the history of horrors—there might have been a simple load of common lumber on her deck, which floating off with those heroes cast into the sea would have afforded rafts for the support of hundreds of the stronger. Indeed, a few nails and a load of lumber would have made a good raft in that last hour when every boat had gone. But, no, that boat of enervating and idiotic luxury had no simple thing aboard. And for lack of simple things it and they died, as many others have died for lack of simple things.

But my point, I think, is clear, that all-steel vessels, with all-metal equipment, while reducing internal dangers often serve to increase external dangers. In other words, it is a very curious fact that a kind of permanent ratio of marine danger seems to be maintained.

It comes to this: How can a mad race for luxury and speed be made safe? Of course it can not be made safe, on sea or land or in the air. No legislation can make it safe. We can create a sort of poor relative safety only.

If men and women demand 23 knots speed to Europe, they must accept certain dangers which science can but little abate.

If they demand a welter of foolish luxuries on land or sea, they must accept that danger which always attends the lack of simple things and simple living.

Great vessels with Russian baths, and Turkish baths, and plunge baths, and squash courts, and racquet courts, and lounges, and palm rooms, and Pompeiian rooms—with the hideous size and power required for all this—must present dangers to those who use them past comprehension. For me, I should not, with my observation of ships, ride a nautical knot on one of them. And I blush for that enervated life of my countrymen which demands them.

Of course in discussing this matter I have not touched upon the vast waste of our best coal now going on, for these ocean racers require trainloads of hundreds of cars of coal for a single voyage, a waste never to be replaced, and all in order to push our luxury-loving people at breakneck speed over the seas and into Paris a day or two sooner.

But I think I see signs of returning sanity. Several forces are operating. First. Our people are becoming conscious of the dangers. Second. The great cost of operating these monsters is troubling their owners. Third. Our rich are pausing to consider whether their riotous display of luxury has not in it elements of danger in this democracy of ours. Fourth. The inability of these great ships to use the ports of the world—outside of two or three ports—and the general desirability of having ships which can be easily switched onto any route—a desirability now accented by this war. Fifth. The difficulty of managing in times of danger a vast concourse of passengers distributed over 500 feet of a 900-foot vessel, increasing danger to life—a thing very observable to one who studies the loss of the Titanic. All these things, I say, are tending to a return to sanity. Meanwhile we can help by refusing to use such vessels.

To those who look to the House's Committee on the Merchant Marine for the creation of safety at sea, I say, "Gentlemen, we have done our best under the circumstances of a wild desire on the part of our people for great size, great speed, great luxury, and great everything. It is the best that we can do, and at that we have been able to require but little more than experience has already induced vessels to adopt."

I trust that marine accidents will henceforth all be as polite as that recent one between the Practoria and the New York, where they came together in the daytime, almost bow on, so that they kissed hard, sheered off, one leaving her anchor on the deck of the other as a memento of a warm contact.

I can not end this address, Mr. Speaker, without a word of admiration for Mr. Andrew Furuseth, who has represented the seamen of this country throughout our long hearings. We are indebted to him for much information. I know lawyers, a plenty, with incomes of ten thousand a year and much more, whose advocacy of any cause has never been as forceful as the advocacy of plain, hard-handed Andrew Furuseth. I did not at first agree with many of his propositions, but since reading the account of the Titanic's loss, especially that in the remarkable book of Col. Gracie, I have come to see the meaning of his position. And these words may be applied with the same propriety to Mr. Olander and Capt. Wescott, his associates. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] use some of his time?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MANAHAN].

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty of getting comparative safety at sea under modern conditions as the result of intelligent legislation is not as great, in my judgment, as might be indicated by the address of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOWDLE] to which we have just listened. Nor do I concur in his view that, left to themselves, the shipowners have, as a matter of voluntary care, approximately met the requirements of this bill. I believe that the shipowners, to a certain degree, have met the demands of the public for a greater degree of safety, but nevertheless I am convinced that it is of very great importance that we legislate in a way that will compel men who undertake to transport passengers at sea to do their plain duty.

Now, I am in favor of this bill and propose to vote for it, but not on the theory that as regards the safety at sea it is an improvement on the La Follette bill, for which it is a substitute.

I think in that respect this bill is still weak in certain portions, and I am hopeful that when the matter goes to conference with the Senate that this weakness will be removed.

Regarding the provisions of the bill as they affect the life of the seamen, inasmuch as they lift the seamen from a condition of serfdom to that of liberty and a fair condition of life as laboring men, the bill is a splendid tribute to the intelligence and the patriotism of the men who undertook to formulate it. But regarding safety at sea, some provisions ought to be modified and, as I say, I hope they will be modified in conference.

The provision of the bill which exempts from its terms vessels operating in bays and sounds is, to my mind, a dangerous provision, because there are bays and sounds, as a simple scrutiny of the map of the United States will disclose, in which there is quite as much danger to navigation as there is upon the open sea. I believe that provision ought to be modified.

Regarding lifeboats, too much generosity has been shown to the shipowners. It is not, in my opinion, fair to the traveling public, who are obliged to use the Great Lakes, to provide during the season of greatest travel, in the summer time, as this bill does, that only 20 per cent of the passengers shall have lifeboat provisions and only three-tenths of the passengers shall have pontoon or life-raft provisions, leaving the balance without any protection whatever. I come from the Northwest and am familiar with conditions on the Great Lakes, and when I say that the waters of Lake Superior all the year around are practically ice cold, it is obvious that a provision for 20 per cent of lifeboats in case of accident is entirely insufficient.

I believe also that the provision which limits the application of the law to vessels sailing outside of the 20-mile limit is an unreasonable concession to shipowners, because there is, in my judgment, quite as much danger in the open sea 19½ miles from shore as there is 100 miles from shore. But as I say, outside of these provisions, which are concessions to the stern demands, as I may express it, of shipowners, the bill is a very good bill, and the substitute is entitled to the vote of this House.

Regarding the difficulty of making the bill I might express this thought: That any remedial legislation will always be difficult while we permit men engaged in large business to exercise influence against legislation which will in the slightest degree cut off the dividends of that business.

The opposition to the La Follette bill and to this bill regarding the lifeboat provision has not been opposition based upon an intelligent consideration of the dangers at sea, but opposition which has its support in the matter of the earning capacity of the vessels. Without question if it were not for the greedy desire of these men who own these ships, regardless of public safety, to increase their dividends, they would not undertake to carry more passengers than they could protect and provide for in case of accident; but for the sake of dividends they sacrifice the rights of the public to a competitive degree of safety, and I have little sympathy with arguments that are based upon the proposition that the business requirements of these great companies require a certain degree of jeopardy to be borne by the traveling public.

And that is why I am so much in sympathy with the project, now shortly to be called before the House, of having this Government itself undertake to place upon the sea vessels of its own, either directly under it or by some corporation which it controls, because I am satisfied that if this Government intelligently and patriotically provides for a line of vessels to ply between our coasts and foreign shores and between the cities of our own coasts it will demonstrate in a few years that it will be possible for great companies operating as private corporations not only to carry passengers at a cheaper rate than they now charge but to provide for every essential thing necessary to protect the public and passengers who are compelled to travel upon the seas. I believe that the rates have been excessive, and that the safety provisions have been inadequate under the private ownership of these great steamship companies, solely as a result of greed, and not as a matter of construction or intelligent operation.

Therefore I welcome the opportunity brought upon us by the war abroad of having our Government as a Government undertake the public service of transportation, and undertake it under such conditions as will make a demonstration that the great private-ownership carriers upon the sea, as upon the land, have been exploiting the public as a result of greed, without regard to necessity, and with scant respect for the ordinary rights of man. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING] is recognized.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, ever since this legislation was proposed in the other Chamber I have given to it considerable attention, an attention which was enhanced by a study of the legislation along this line which was passed by this body in the years gone by and which failed of enactment for reasons which at this time it is unnecessary to refer to.

And accordingly I have given the greatest attention to the arguments of those who have opposed and those who are opposing this measure. I was desirous of approaching this subject with an open mind, but I freely admit that if arguments were not forthcoming to show the futility or the impracticability of this legislation I would be ultimately inclined to favor it for humanitarian reasons.

Now, what do we find? Stripped of all of the nonessentials, you will discover that all of the arguments advanced finally come around to one of increased cost to the vessel owner. He does not want to remodel his vessel so as to provide for necessary lifeboat equipment; he objects to the alteration of the lines of beauty in his craft; objects to the employment of more able seamen and less of the riffraff, who will work for small wages in the hope that tips will add to their total receipts, and they object to everything and anything which would mean the expenditure of an extra dollar.

We have met just such objections before; in fact, we can not move here in the direction of legislating for humanity that we do not hear a wail from the men whose sacred dollar is assailed and who are so intent upon its worship that their ears are closed to the cries of suffering humanity. We hear it every time a workingmen's compensation act is proposed; every time that we strive to secure steel cars for railway mail clerks; every time that we insist upon safety appliances, more stringent mine regulations, and necessary equipment for the greater safety of human life on the sea and upon land.

On the one side, then, we have the men who oppose this bill because they want their dollars protected, and in advocacy of the bill we have the plea of those whose business it is to spend the best part of their lives on the sea, as well as the plea of those who have lost loved ones in the past few years owing to causes which could have been prevented and will be prevented if this bill becomes a law.

It is said that only the seamen's union is really behind this legislation. That I deny. The press of the civilized world in April, 1912, called for measures to prevent a duplication of the loss of life caused by the wreck of the Titanic and the burning of the Volturno and accompanying human sacrifices emphasized the fact that we have left all of these months pass by and have failed to heed the lesson which the wreck of the Titanic brought home to us.

In the history of navigation we have seen progress made in the effort to protect human life and in the improvement in the conditions surrounding the men who sail the sea, but every step has been resisted by the shipowner until public opinion has forced him to give each successive inch. Flogging at sea, manhandling of sailors, wormy biscuit, rotten meats, and an absence of vegetables, which resulted in scurvy, have all been a part of the record of the history of navigation within a reasonable time. There has been a betterment in conditions, we all admit, but is it not a fact that every improvement has been reluctantly given by the shipowner in response to an irresistible public demand?

On the other hand, look at the money spent in catering to the pleasure of the carrying trade. The salons of our trans-Atlantic passenger steamers are a cause for wonder. Money has been lavishly expended and the appointments of the various suites, the arrangements made for play, the palm gardens, the spacious walks for the promenaders, and the music provided for those who dance all testify to what extent the comfort of the passengers calls for heavy expenditures.

Everything is done to cater to the joys of existence—music, laughter, drinking, gaming, playing, all going on below, while above there is a lack of lifeboats, and that lack is accentuated by the fact that when the time comes to use these lifeboats the vessel owner, who has spent so much to cater to the pleasure loving, has only waiters, bartenders, and stewards to do the work of sailors in handling these boats so that the lives of the passengers may be saved. Oh, yes; he caters to the pleasures of the travelers, but over every entrance to the cabins and saloons he should have the inscription plainly shown: "Eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow you may die."

The two points covered by this bill are, first, an assurance of greater safety for those who travel on ships, and, second, an assurance of more humane treatment for those who have to man the ships.

This bill realizes the difference between those who labor upon land and those whose labors carry them upon the sea, but with all differences allowed for and admitted, we see no reason why the sailor is not entitled to every protection due to a free man. We have abolished slavery on land, and we can not and will not tolerate it longer on the sea—at least, it will not be protected under the American flag.

That is the sum total of this legislation. We have paid heed to the tears and to the agony of the relatives of those who went down with the Titanic; we keenly felt our negligence when the Volturno holocaust caused so many to ask, "How much longer?" And now the question is up to us, shall we delay longer, and shall we continue to make dollar rights superior to human rights?

Nobody believes that this legislation will accomplish all that we desire, but it is a step in the right direction, and while there are in this bill things which I do not approve, yet I will gladly vote for it, because I believe it to be right in the main, and it marks the most advanced step ever taken by any nation in the way of throwing safeguards around human life.

The things to which I object are in reality of but little moment as regards the essential features of the bill. The fear of not being able to secure enough able-bodied seamen to man our vessels has no weight with me. Labor, skilled or unskilled, will inevitably follow the road which leads to the greater financial reward, and while this bill will, I believe, surely lead to an increase in wages, that increase will afford the needed stimulus to men to turn to the sea for a livelihood.

There is one thing in this bill to which I do object, and I will now briefly refer to it.

In section 12 the amendment proposed to section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is vicious in so far as it will give encouragement to the dead beat. I can well imagine the case where a penniless sailor is taken ill while out of employment. He is cared for and nursed, because the parties so caring for him rely upon the time when he will be able to earn and pay for services rendered. Now, if we are going to protect the dead beats by such legislation as this and enable them to evade payment of just debts, is it not reasonable to believe that the honest seaman will be the real sufferer in the end, for he will not be able to secure succor and the means to live at a time when sickness or lack of employment prevents him from being able to pay his way? I am of the belief that the greatest protection you can give to the honest man is to put a penalty upon dishonesty, for by so doing we give some assurance that honesty will be the rule.

In the debate on this measure in the other branch of Congress it was stated that section 13 of this act would not necessarily require that 75 per cent in each department on a vessel would have to understand the English language, as under the terms of that section such per cent would have "to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel," and that as these orders might be conveyed by signs or by the taps of a bell, such knowledge of the language would not be demanded.

As far as routine orders go I can see where such a construction would apply; but the language of this bill reads "any order given," and that of necessity would compel a knowledge of the language in which the order is given, for no human understanding could provide signs or bell taps which would govern every emergency or insure understanding of "any order given" unless the language in which it was given was understood and the intent of the order fully comprehended.

The one serious objection raised is in regard to the abrogation of treaties, and I can appreciate the honesty and sincerity of those who advance such objection. But the passage of this act need not lead to any complications. If we pass this bill, there will be one feature in many of our treaties which will contravene the terms of this act, and we simply say to the nations of the world: "Our treaties with you are agreeable to us in every feature, save one. If you wish your vessels to trade with us, if you wish to profit by having a part of our ocean-carrying trade, then we ask that you arrange with your vessel owners whose ships do business in our ports that they shall see to it that they comply with our rules and regulations."

The bulk of our trade was carried on the vessels of a few, a very few, foreign nations, and it is not likely that they will give up that trade because this legislation does not please them. Will they not be far more likely to consent to the amendment of the treaties so that they will conform to the requirements of our legislation? And if they refuse, will it not inevitably lead to our taking care of our own carrying trade and thus bring about the very thing which we all believe to be of such great importance to our Nation?

I have not the slightest fear as to what the result will be. We have what these nations greatly covet, and we have the right to put reasonable restrictions around it, knowing that those who seek to get it must play the game according to our rules.

There are those who would have us delay in the enactment of this legislation until such time as we can confer with the nations of the earth and formulate satisfactory rules. Nothing is to be gained by such delay. The nations most interested have a selfish interest in the prevention of any legislation not satisfactory to the shipowners. They have coddled, nursed, and subsidized them in an endeavor to secure a larger percentage of the trade of the world, and they will not aid in restrictions which will be opposed by such owners. The United States is the only Nation in position to take the lead in such legislation, and we will be untrue to ourselves if we fail to take advantage of our opportunity. We have the carrying trade which these nations covet. We have the right to lay down the rules; and if we delay now and wait until we can get a mutual agreement, it will follow that we will have another toll of human life sacrificed and another arousing of public opinion before we reach the vantage ground upon which we stand to-day.

It is a great opportunity this which is offered to America. We have by our votes here on a day not long ago shown to the world how earnestly we desire not only to live in peace with all of the nations of the earth, but also to restrict as far as possible the chance to carry on war. That was a splendid act and reflects credit upon this body. Now we have another opportunity—the opportunity to head the procession of nations in the work of putting human life and human rights above aught else and compelling dollar rights to take their place in the rear. That we may utilize this opportunity by passing this legislation, and that, too, by an overwhelming majority, is my earnest hope, and to that end my vote shall be cast, for I feel certain that by so doing we will give an impetus toward securing needed humanitarian legislation which will have a beneficial effect in all parts of the world.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, am I confined to the subject of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Not especially.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, permit me to speak of something that is personal.

I have been convinced that the leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is right; that it is the business of Members of Congress to maintain a quorum upon this floor.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield the floor, Mr. Speaker, and finish my remarks later. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-one Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 278 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has the floor, and the Chair desires to read to him the agreement under which we are proceeding:

That to-morrow, immediately after the approval of the Journal, it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules upon the bill S. 136, the seamen's bill, with certain committee amendments, and if a second is demanded, that the second shall be considered as ordered, and that two hours of debate on the bill shall be in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed in the time allotted to him and talk upon any subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to proceed for five minutes to talk about anything he chooses to talk about. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for making this request. When I was taken off my feet by my conscience-stricken friend from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH]—he, too, has become a reformer, like the rest of us. How long reform will remain with him I do not know, but it has come to me to stay, and I give the House notice that Members will push their trunks back under the bed. [Applause and laughter.] This is not personal with me. I am simply performing, as I understand it, conscientiously a duty that has been imposed upon me. My attention has been called to what constitutes a performance of duty commended by the people, and that is an enforcement of the law. On last Tuesday, when I was unfortunate enough not to be here, and so could not have the pleasure of voting against this resolution—because, if you will permit the statement, that I never voted for such a resolution, as I have endeavored to serve without embarrassing one Member of this House. I believe each Member is responsible to the country and to his constituency and not bound by any particular rule [applause] of this House for his guidance. The leader of the majority said on this floor:

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, it is far better for this House and the country for us to stay here and to attend to business and keep a quorum on the floor of the House, so that business may be attended to by a majority of the House.

Listen:

Applause on the Democratic side.

Mr. Speaker, we have been here three hours to-day and we have done nothing. No work has been accomplished except a little general debate. It is not the fault of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], who attends to his business strictly and conscientiously. It was because a quorum was absent from the floor. That lack of a quorum was caused by the absence of Members who, like myself, have been seeking the joys and companionship of their homes; and I want it understood that whenever I go home the Sergeant at Arms is at liberty to deduct the day pay from my salary.

Mr. GORDON. You will be docked $20 a day.

Mr. BUTLER. Twenty dollars and forty-five cents a day. I know it is not easy to lose that much if you need it; but permit me to say that I serve my constituents for two reasons: First, because I want to and through their forbearance and toleration, and, secondly, because of the salary attached to the office. [Laughter.] Without the salary I can not live. But the House has been wise. It has provided, as I understand, that I shall be docked for the days in the month I am absent. The leader of the majority has made me wise, and I shall be absent no more. [Laughter.] I want the gentlemen of this House to understand that there is nothing personal in the position I have taken when I propose to see that a quorum is present, and if you want to do business you will remain where you are now for the remainder of the session. I am here to stay. [Laughter and applause.] If I have any time left, I will be glad to yield it to somebody.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the principal points of difference between the Senate bill and the substitute offered by the House committee relate to lifeboats and able seamen. The Senate bill provides that there shall be seaworthy lifeboats to afford accommodations for all on board, passengers and crew. The Senate bill in relation to able seamen says that lifeboats shall be manned by at least two able seamen each, and that the qualifications of an able seaman shall consist of three years' service at sea or on the Great Lakes.

After fair and impartial hearings and consideration of those two points the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries thought it wise to change them in some respects.

The Senate bill makes no provision for a lessening of the number of lifeboats or of able seamen in the summer during the excursion seasons. Our substitute makes provision for full life-saving accommodations on all ocean-going passenger and cargo vessels. At least 75 per cent of those accommodations are to be in lifeboats and the balance in life rafts or collapsible boats. It has been found by experience that a provision for all lifeboats and no rafts is an unwise provision. There are times, exigencies and emergencies, in which lifeboats can not be used to the same advantage as can life rafts. The Senate bill made no provision for the carrying of life rafts. In view of the fact that the testimony showed us that life rafts in certain emergencies were the only available means of life saving, we thought it wise to make provision for the carrying of a portion of the life-saving apparatus in the shape of life rafts. This provision for safety accommodations for passengers and crew in the case of ocean-going steamers prevails the entire year. The other provisions of the substitute, in relation to accommodations for the saving of passengers and crew, provide that there shall be full accommodations for passengers and crew all the year round, except in the case of the lakes, bays, and sounds and vessels going not more than 20 miles off the coast during the four summer months. It is only in the case of the excursion season when full provisions for life saving are not required to be carried.

The evidence before us showed that in the case of very many large vessels on the Great Lakes it would be impossible for them to comply with the provisions of the Senate bill which required full lifeboat accommodation for all passengers and crew on board. It was shown that to comply with these provisions of the bill it would be necessary to overhaul the large vessels at a cost nearly as great as the original cost of the vessel, or else the lifeboats would have to be stored on the upper decks and would make the vessel topheavy and easily capsized, thus rendering travel at sea more dangerous than if there were less lifeboats. This dangerous feature can be easily surmised by anyone familiar with steamboats.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I understood from the remarks of the chairman of the committee that the rules for carrying lifeboats would be suspended on some boats running from Buffalo to Cleveland and Detroit. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if that is true?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. In the first place, I doubt very much if the chairman made any such statement, because there is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I understood him to say that that was because they passed some other boat every six or seven minutes, and that the provision in those cases would be waived.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I think he did make the statement that they passed other boats often, but that was to show that the travel on the Great Lakes was not so dangerous as it is on the ocean.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Would that apply to boats between Ludington and Chicago and Milwaukee and St. Joe?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. It applies to all ports on the Great Lakes. The rule under the same conditions is uniform.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to be a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for a period of 10 years, and during that time this bill or one similar to it was considered a great portion of the time. Now, in so far as this bill has a tendency to increase safety at sea, in so far as it is any benefit to the American sailor, I am in favor of it. I think I am well within the facts when I say that there has not been any time in the last six or eight years when a bill to abolish arrest for desertion of American seamen could not have passed this House. There are, however, some provisions in this bill that I wish were not in it; but it is much better than the Senate bill.

I think section 13 should be stricken out. The purpose of that section is admirable, and if it would accomplish what it was intended to accomplish, I would support it. The purpose is to do away with Chinese crews, something that every American citizen would like to see done.

But how will it work on the Pacific coast? You take the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., which employs Chinese crews. It means $100,000 for the round trip to each one of those vessels, according to a statement of the manager of that company. They run to-day in competition with Japanese vessels, which are subsidized for $100,000 each trip in gold by the Government. The result will be that you will not do away with the Chinese crew, but you will put the Japanese flag on these vessels or put them entirely out of business. I understand that arrangements have already been made by these vessels to take down the American flag if this bill is passed.

On Puget Sound the effect of this bill will be the same. Take the steamship Minnesota, for illustration, which is the largest vessel now on the Pacific Ocean. If this bill goes into effect, the American flag will undoubtedly be taken from that ship. It would increase the cost of the operation of the Minnesota more than $100,000 each round trip. This vessel is now running in competition with Japanese competitors that are heavily subsidized by their Government. If the Minnesota was subsidized in the same proportion, it would receive $150,000 in gold for each round trip. Under this tremendous handicap, if you place the additional one that will come with this bill, it takes no prophet to say that this great vessel will either quit running or go under the Japanese flag. It is my information that arrangements have already been made, if this bill becomes law, for the Minnesota to either quit the ocean or take a foreign flag. The result of this bill, then, will be, so far as the Pacific is concerned, that it will simply change the American flag for the foreign flag on the Minnesota and the Pacific Mail vessels. It will result in American officers being displaced by foreign officers. It will benefit no American citizen. It will not give an additional job to any American sailor, but, on the contrary, it will lose these great vessels to this country and will replace American by foreign officers.

Another result will come to Seattle following the passage of this bill that will not so vitally affect other portions of the country. There are several foreign lines running into Seattle. This bill will greatly increase the burdens of these vessels. When they come into Seattle their crews will be permitted to desert. If they go to Vancouver, only a short distance away in British Columbia, they will avoid this trouble. This bill tells them the character of sailors they shall employ and the language that they shall speak and how they shall be paid, the purpose being to get rid of cheap crews. This will increase the cost of every foreign vessel that comes into the port of Seattle from $10,000 to $50,000 each trip. All these burdens can be avoided by these vessels going to Vancouver. There is no reason why a foreign vessel should prefer Seattle to Vancouver. Certainly it can not be one of sentiment or patriotism. The facilities at Vancouver are practically as good as those at Seattle. The Canadian Government is making great improvements in the harbor facilities of Vancouver. The result of this bill, then, will be to drive from the Pacific Ocean the few American vessels that remain and make Vancouver instead of Seattle the great commercial city of the Pacific Northwest, and in doing this we will not be conferring a favor upon any American citizen or upon any American interest.

It has been repeatedly urged that the purpose of this bill is to favor the American sailor. Fairness on the part of those making these statements would suggest that they point out the fact that there are practically no American sailors in the foreign trade; therefore none to be freed. In the coastwise trade the law providing for arrest in case of desertion was abolished many years ago, so that the argument that this bill is in behalf of abolishing involuntary servitude, so far as the American seaman is concerned, is without merit. If it is urged, as it has been, that we should free the sailors of other nations, then my reply is that if these foreign sailors thought enough of our country to become American citizens, then they would have the advantage of our laws. If they do not think enough of this Nation to become American citizens, then I do not think that they should appeal to us to confer favors upon them that the nations to which they owe allegiance will not confer.

I want to call the attention of the House to the inconsistency of the recent legislation in regard to the merchant marine. First comes a bill to purchase foreign ships, which gives the President the power to suspend the laws that now place too heavy burdens on American ships in order that we may be able to put the vessels under the American flag. Here to-day you come with a bill increasing these very burdens that you give the President the power to suspend.

A few days ago you brought in a bill for the purpose of inducing American citizens to purchase foreign vessels and place them under the American flag. You follow that by introducing a bill authorizing the Government to go into the business of buying ships. Now, really, do you believe that any sane American citizen is going to place his money in these ships, even in this great emergency when at the same time you are holding over him the threat of the Government going into the same business? Are private citizens going to compete with the Government? You make an appeal to the American citizen to invest in shipping, and immediately follow it by proposed Government ownership, and then by passing this bill making it impossible for him to profitably run a vessel if he buys it. This utter inconsistency can only be accounted for by the lack of the Democratic Party to entirely understand what is necessary to build up a merchant marine. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the most objectionable portion of this bill. I hope I may have the attention of the House for a moment, because certainly there can be no politics in this portion of the bill.

Section 13 prescribes the character of the sailor, his qualifications, how old he shall be, what experience he shall have had, and what language he shall speak or understand. If this section only applied to American ships, then it might be unwise, but it would not be dangerous to our national peace, but it applies to foreign ships. Here we stand in this position to-day—the only great nation of the world that lacks the intelligence and patriotism to have a merchant marine of our own, and yet in this bill we propose to tell the other nations of the world that have shown sufficient intelligence to have a merchant marine how they shall run it, how they shall man their ships, what shall be the qualifications of the sailors, and how they shall pay them.

Let me illustrate what will happen if this bill becomes law. Suppose one of the great Japanese vessels comes into the harbor of San Francisco. Under the provisions of this bill, any citizen can file an affidavit that some members of the crew of that vessel do not understand the Japanese language, or that some members of that crew are not 19 years of age, or that they have not had two years' service at sea, or three years upon the Great Lakes, or that any other of the numerous requirements of this bill have not been complied with.

Mr. MADDEN. Three years on the ocean and two years on the Great Lakes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is four on the Great Lakes. It takes four seasons to make a sailor on the Great Lakes, and three on the ocean.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is three years at sea and two years on the Great Lakes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it is 24 months.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Two years are 24 months.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Twenty-four months do not make two years on the Great Lakes in shipping, and the gentleman knows it. Navigation is closed about six months in the year. That provision was put in there intentionally and purposely. There is no mistake about that. I give the committee credit for too much intelligence to say that this provision of "24 months" went in by mistake. As I was saying, the situation will be this: One of these great vessels will come into port and someone will file one of these affidavits. What will be the result? The collector of customs then is required under this law to seize that vessel and muster the crew and not permit that vessel to depart until it has complied with that law.

If the sailors desert, as they will have a right to do under this bill, and it is a Japanese vessel, that vessel can not leave port until it gets another Japanese crew; and, if they desert in an American port, is it possible for that Japanese vessel to secure another crew that will meet the requirements of this bill? Certainly in some ports it will not be possible. Yet this vessel of a friendly nation that has in every way complied with her own laws and with her treaty obligations with us will not be permitted to depart from our harbors until they have complied with the many provisions of this bill. Does anyone believe that any self-respecting nation is going to submit to such indignities? What right have we to tell other nations how they shall treat their own citizens on their own vessels? A vessel of a nation is the soil of that nation. If we can tell them what they shall do with their own citizens on their own vessels, then we can tell them what they can do with their own citizens in their own country. I am one man from the Pacific coast that has not talked publicly about war with Japan. I think entirely too much has been said upon that question. I think we have not always shown that proud and sensitive people the consideration and courtesy that we should. I do not believe Japan wants war with this Nation; but I do not delude myself by believing that they would not declare war if they thought they had sufficient provocation. This bill is in violation of our treaties; it is in violation of the spirit of fairness and friendship we owe to other nations. I say to this House to-day that if you place this law upon the statute books and attempt to enforce it we will have war with Japan inside of 30 days. Certainly the other nations of the world will look upon us with suspicion if we enact such legislation just now. I have too much confidence in the President of the United States and in his intelligence and patriotism to believe that he will ever sign this bill or attempt to enforce its provisions at this most inopportune time. I believe that when it goes to him he will have the patriotism and courage that President Taft had when a similar bill came to him, and that he will refuse to sign it. Think of those provisions in the bill, in the face of our treaties, and then argue that any of the great nations of the world are going to submit to it without protest. England and Germany may submit to these provisions for a time; but it is an insult to every great shipping nation in the world. They may submit to it while they are in this great struggle, but at the end of the war they will insist that it be abrogated. Who thinks this an opportune time for the denouncing of treaties and the imposition of harsh and unreasonable terms upon the vessels of friendly nations?

Certainly every American citizen feels that this is the time to avoid all friction, that this is the time above all others in our Nation's history when we should do nothing that any other nation could construe as unfriendly or as an attempt to unjustly increase our commercial advantages. What the people of this Nation desire to-day above all things else is that this Nation should do all things honorable to maintain peace with all the other nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the gentleman has exercised such a show of intelligence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RUSSELL). The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not interrupt the count.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I desire to make the point of order that that is dilatory, it having been demonstrated within the last 10 minutes that there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-eight Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. This roll call shows there are 282 Members present—a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. EAGAN, Mr. HART was granted leave of absence on account of serious illness.

Mr. DOOLITTLE was granted leave of absence for one week on account of sickness.

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 24, 1914.

Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. TRIMBLE: I do not know in what form the generous resolution of the House of Representatives tendering their sympathy to me when the House first learned of the serious character of Mrs. Wilson's illness ought to be answered. I only know that I earnestly hope that you may find some means of conveying to the Members of the House my sense of genuine gratitude to them for their kind thought of me. After all, these human relationships are the real relationships and bind us together.

Sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

[Mr. SMALL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in 10 minutes it is impossible even to touch the various points that might be discussed, but I want to refer briefly to the statements of the gentleman from Washington of two classes. First, he declares that section 13 of this bill will give all the transoceanic trade on the Pacific Ocean to the Japanese, and, second, that the passage of this bill will so insult the Japanese that it will bring on war with them. I want to say right now that if we give them all this trade they are not going to be insulted or go to war with us by reason of the bill. I want to say in the next place that both those statements are absurd. He argues that our language test will prevent our ships employing any Chinese seamen, and therefore the cheaper Japanese crews will take the whole business. That argument is false, because Mr. Schwerin, the man representing the biggest shipowning business on the Pacific slope, stated under oath before our committee while being cross-examined about section 13, which requires that 75 per cent of the sailors on vessels clearing our ports shall be able to understand the language of the officers, that 90 per cent of the Chinese sailors whom he now employs understand the language of the officers. And his cross-examination shows that this provision will not interfere with a single ship that he has. Mr. Schwerin also undertook to show that his Chinese had stayed with him, and I think also that they were the best seamen on the ocean, so the requirement as to able seamen will not seriously interfere with hiring Chinese. It is not necessary to refer further to that ominous prediction of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Excuse me. I have not the time. I have other matters to discuss.

I want to say to my distinguished and esteemed friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMALL] that for one I do hope his anticipation of embarking this country on the sea of discriminating duties will not be realized in his lifetime nor in mine, because that sea is the sea of commercial struggle and warfare and cutthroat methods; it is not the field of peaceful and legitimate rivalry between great nations striving for the commerce of the world by superior skill and capacity.

The imposition of discriminating duties or tonnage dues on foreign vessels entering our ports with import cargoes, in order to give our ships an advantage over them, in what would otherwise be competitive transportation, is just another and the last phase of protection. It is seeking to beat our rivals not by excellence or superiority but by putting heavy burdens on them. That was the policy of nearly all nations up to about 1815. When the Union of our States was made permanent by the adoption of our present Constitution that policy was in vogue, and was being used especially by Great Britain very greatly to the detriment of our shipping interests. Our several States, acting separately, were powerless to retaliate, because they could not act uniformly. If Massachusetts imposed heavy tonnage dues on foreign ships, New York would impose less heavy dues, and the foreign ships would go to New York instead of Boston, and the trade of Boston would suffer. Then Boston might underbid New York and take the trade away from New York. While we were thus unable to act together, England laid heavy dues on our ships going to her ports, and thereby nearly destroyed our shipping. One of the first things the United States Congress did after the adoption of the Constitution gave it control over our foreign commerce was to enact a retaliatory law, imposing the same tonnage dues and special duties on foreign vessels and goods carried in them in our ports that were levied on our vessels and goods carried in them in their ports. There was no division of parties or opinion on the subject. Everybody agreed that so long as our vessels were penalized in foreign ports, foreign vessels must be penalized in our ports. This condition persisted until 1815, covering the administrations of Washington, John Adams, Jefferson, and part of Madison's term.

On this foundation of fact, ignorant or unscrupulous advocates of ship subsidies or discriminating dues are constantly declaring that the Democratic Party in its early history and Mr. Jefferson favored discriminating duties and tonnage dues. They ought to know, and do know, if they have read our history, that at all times Mr. Jefferson and those who followed his political teachings were opposed to the policy, except when driven to it in self-defense, and against its practice by other nations. Mr. Jefferson declared that if he could he would have the seas free on equal terms to the ships and commerce of all nations. While all nations were guilty of this policy of obstruction, our commerce and shipping was equally obstructed by it with that of other nations, but no more so, and we held our own. Besides this, from about the beginning of our Government down to 1815 all Europe was rent and torn by the Napoleonic wars, and European ships were nearly all swept from the ocean, so that our merchant marine grew beyond all others in those early years. But no one in 1815 attributed that growth to discriminating dues. As soon as our war of 1812 was ended and peace was made in Europe, we passed our act of 1815, repealing our discriminating dues in favor of those nations who would repeal theirs in our favor, and began earnestly to negotiate treaties with one nation after another having that end in view. England, on account of her colonial possessions, especially her West Indian possessions and her hoped-for advantages therefrom, clung longest to the vicious policy. All parties here were of one mind and worked together preaching the doctrine of free seas. We had a big trade with the West Indies, and England, while admitting our ships to all her other ports, on fair terms, for a long time refused to let them into that trade except on grievous terms. The people of her colonies (West Indian) groaned and complained to her, because they believed and truly believed they shared in bearing the burdens. Still England persisted, and our ships in that trade paid enormous taxes. Finally our controversy with England reached the point where she absolutely closed her West Indian ports to our ships. About that time Andrew Jackson came to the White House and succeeded where so many had failed in breaking down England's resistance, and the fight, waged since 1815, for free seas was won in 1828 or 1829. We enlarged and deepened our harbors and opened them to the ships of all nations in our trade with them on equal terms with our own ships. Their ports were likewise opened to us. Under this policy our merchant marine flourished. We more than held our own with the greatest maritime nations of the earth. From 1800 to 1860, the era in this country of Democratic rule, our merchant marine in the foreign trade was great. It was great because it contended on equal terms with all other nations on the ocean. Under that policy we had the second greatest merchant marine that the world ever saw. And had that policy continued we would have the second greatest, if not the greatest, merchant marine on earth to-day.

I want to reiterate here the statement that I have always made. I am ambitious to see a great American merchant marine built up, but I do not believe the way to do it is to pursue the tactics that have been pursued by the Republican Party for 60 years. I will not attempt to discuss how much the war had to do with the doing away of our merchant marine in 1860. I grant it was harmful, just as the Napoleonic wars harmed the merchant marine of Europe, 1800–1815; but our Republican friends have practically had 60 years of the administration of this Government, and for 10 years of that time the gentleman from Washington has been a leading Member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine. They have surely had ample time to succeed with their policies, their ideas, their notions, but under their policies our flag gradually disappeared from the sea, and at the end of their régime in this good year, when war comes upon Europe, involving the shipping of other nations, we have no merchant marine to carry even our own commerce to the foreign lands that desire it. Their policy has been a failure, and they can not claim that the Democratic Party in any way contributed to that policy. If their policy has been a failure, it is wisdom for us to try another policy. To my mind, that policy ought to be the one which stood us in good stead from 1815 to 1860, when Europe was at peace and the United States was at peace, under which we held our own, and more than held our own, on the ocean with England and every other nation of the earth. That is the policy of free seas on equal terms to us and all other nations. We should do what every other nation under the sun does—let our shipowners buy their ships wherever they can get them, nail the flag of our country to the mast, put officers of our country on deck, and let them sail in what seas, in whatever trade, and to whatever ports they desire, without let or hindrance or limitation, and have an American merchant marine. But we have petted and pampered a certain small interest in this country, our shipbuilding interest, in a way that no other country under the sun has done. Under that petting and pampering the ships that fly our flag must be built by our shipbuilders, and under that privilege our shipbuilders make them cost us 50 per cent more than the ships of other nations. It is time for us to think. Sixty years of that petting and pampering has destroyed our merchant marine, and in the presence of the great war of the European countries we stand helpless and without a vessel to carry our goods across the ocean. And when, in this stress, the conference committee the other day reported a bill that would have given us free ships, the representatives and lobbyists of shipbuilders and their allies the coastwise shipping combination swooped down on the Senate and defeated the bill.

Give us the ships that cost the same money; then permit us to run those ships at the same expense with other ships coming to our ports, and our flag will get on the sea. And this bill is going to accomplish that second, purpose. With free ships this bill will put the navigation of American ships under the American flag on an equality with every other ship. Mr. Speaker, we have had a barbarous law that when a seaman signed articles on the other side of the ocean for a round-trip voyage, he came across——

Mr. GALLIVAN. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman has no right to interrupt the gentleman from Texas while he is speaking.

Mr. HARDY. And I do not yield for that purpose, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I assume the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] is an enemy to this bill and opposed to it. Am I right? Is the gentleman an enemy of this bill?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I have raised the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide it. Evidently there is not.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I make the point of order that the gentleman's point is dilatory. It has been only about 10 minutes since a quorum was shown to be present, and the probability is that it is present at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count in order to ascertain. [After counting.] Before announcing this vote, the Chair wants to make a statement. The Chair has a perfect right to count the Members in the cloakrooms and in these lobbies out here.

Mr. MANN. I take exception to that.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference.

Mr. MANN. Well——

The SPEAKER. That has been decided time and again. Speaker Reed did it, and announced he would count everybody in the cloakrooms; and I will do the same, too. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. And if the Speaker will pardon me, the Democratic Party, including, I think, the present occupant of the chair, termed him a czar for that and other reasons, but that was the extremest reason. I do not think Speaker Reed was justified in it, and I do not believe the present Speaker will be justified in it, nor do I think it will do any good.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference what Speaker Reed was called or what this Speaker is called. Speaker Reed counted and announced that he would continue to count gentlemen who absented themselves and tried to hide in the cloakrooms and in the lobbies, and he announced that all of these rules were made for the purpose of expediting business and not for the purpose of retarding business. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it makes no difference what anybody said about him at the moment, time has vindicated him.

Mr. MANN. Time always vindicates him.

The SPEAKER. I stated that on the floor of the House in 1897, and also that he ought to have a monument built to him for that quorum-counting rule. I was one of the new Members in the Fifty-third Congress who forced a quorum-counting rule to break up filibustering. There are 165 Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 279 Members—a quorum—have responded to their names.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what I said about giving the right to the shipowner to buy ships where he wishes, I know it will be said that that right was granted under the Panama act and has been granted again in a more enlarged sense under the bill which was passed the other day. But I wish to say that when the Panama act was passed I said then that not a ship would be registered under it, for the reasons, first, that while we professed to give the shipowner the right to buy his ship where he pleased, we at the same time denied him, when he put the ship under our flag, any right that he would not have under a foreign flag; and, second, while there was no inducement under that act for him to change his flag, there was some inducement for him not to do it, because by putting his ship under the American flag he gained no right that he did not have under a foreign flag and he lost whatever special rights he might have had under that foreign flag. I do not know just what those rights may be, but doubtless there are many and valuable privileges granted in their domestic trade by all nations to ships under their own flag.

It did not take a prophet to foretell that no foreign-built ship would come under our flag under the terms of the Panama act. None would come in under the amendment to that act we passed the other day but for present war conditions. Mr. Speaker, on the bill before us, which will tend to equalize the cost of operating American and foreign ships, there has been ominous talk of entanglements and war by reason of its provisions with reference to foreign ships. That is a mere will-o'-the-wisp, an idea conjured up in a gentleman's mind, because there is not a burden placed on a foreign ship under this bill that is not also placed on the American ship, and no foreign nation has a right to complain of a burden placed on its ships when that same burden is placed on all the ships that we give the right to enter our ports, our own included. Give us ships of equal cost and operation at equal cost, and American ships will navigate all seas and will carry our commerce; and should the conditions arise in future years that have arisen in the last few weeks, it will not find our country without a flag on the seas or without a ship to carry our products abroad.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HARDY. No; I regret I can not yield. I have less than five minutes. The gentleman does not want to take my time now, I know.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is intended to equalize the cost of operation of the ships—the foreign and the domestic ships. Under an antiquated law, applying to almost all nations, there has been a relic of barbarism of the past preserved in the involuntary servitude of the seamen on board the vessels of all nations. When a seaman signs a contract for a voyage he becomes no longer a freeman under our present law, but a slave, subject to arrest if he violates his civil contract. In no other calling under the sun is a man who makes a civil contract and violates it subject to arrest; but let the sailor violate his civil contract by leaving his ship when she is in safe harbor but when he has not completed his contract, perchance to go back with her on her return voyage, and you get after him with the minions of the law. You put handcuffs upon his wrists, and you throw him on board the vessel he has deserted as lumber, as a property subject, not a freeman, not a man.

My countrymen, I come from the South, and I know the time when the so-called last relic of slavery was abolished in this country. I am here to say that to-day, although I did not like and do not like the manner of its ending, I am glad there is no slavery in this country of the black race to-day. [Applause.] I am equally glad that when the sun goes down this good day, so far as the House can express itself upon it, there will be no further slavery among the white men of this land. [Applause.] I remember as a boy that when the slave fled from his master, or even took the liberty to visit a near-by plantation, he had to look out for the patrol or carry a pass. That day in the South, on the plantation, for the black man has passed.

But the day has not passed when the seaman leaving the ship has to look out for the patrol.

History shows that the struggle for freedom has been an upward struggle, and a hard one, from generation to generation. Who does not know the story of John Bunyan, thrust into prison for violation of a civil obligation, or for the failure to pay a debt? In that prison he dreamed such dreams and painted such pictures as made him immortal among the writers of song and story of the earth. [Applause.] We still have among us a relic of the barbarism that threw John Bunyan into prison. But this bill will strike the chain from off the seaman's wrist and make the seaman as other men in this land—a free man. In doing so, it may be that some contract, made in a pauper-labor, pauper-stricken country, for $12 a month or $8 a month, will be permitted to be violated by the desertion of a seaman on our shores who will get better wages when he returns to work under another flag or in another port. But in doing so a great public policy is served, and every vessel that flies our flag is given an equal showing with other vessels upon the ocean trip between this country and Liverpool, or Bremen, or Hongkong, in the rate of wages paid, and the American flag will fly above free men receiving the same wages that are paid to other seamen, following other flags in our ports, and there is no reason why the American flag should not again compete with every other flag and ride triumphant on every sea under the guidance of American skill and American free manhood. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, please notify me at the end of 5 minutes.

I hope that no one will make the point of no quorum during the few minutes in which I address the House. But speaking of quorums, day before yesterday one of the distinguished Members of the House, in discussing the Underwood resolution, passed on Tuesday, stated in his speech:

> Democrats, regardless of the North, East, West, and South, are demanding that the Republicans stay here and perform their duty. We propose to keep you here now to transact the public business and put through measures that are important to the people of this country. We propose to keep you here and make you attend to your duty.

The Republicans are here, as they have been all the time, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who made these remarks, is not to be found within the precincts of the Capitol. He is good at telling other people what they ought to do. I do not know where he is. Perhaps he has been taken suddenly ill.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the bill which is now before the House, and I want to congratulate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], the ranking Republican on the committee, as well as the rest of the committee, on bringing before the House a bill unanimously agreed upon.

In the last Congress the House passed the seaman's bill after a long discussion, and with a good many amendments. I supported the bill at that time, as most of the other Members did. It went to the Senate, and the Senate passed the bill in the very last days of the Congress. President Taft gave it a pocket veto. Possibly what is now occurring is a justification of what President Taft did in declining to sign the bill, because the present bill is very different from the former bill. I supported both of them. I supported the bill in the last Congress with more knowledge of what it contained than I have as to the present bill. I do not profess to be qualified to judge of the technique of seamanship or the technique of the requirements of vessels at sea; but I can see that in this measure there is an enlarged liberty to the seamen, whatever effect it may have upon the shipowners.

There is one thing in this bill which I regret has to be in it at this particular time. That is the requirement that this Nation shall cancel or give notice of the end of its treaties relating to foreign ships at our shores. The one thing that concerns me more than all the rest to-day is the desire to keep the United States at peace with the world. [Applause.] Very likely these treaties ought to be canceled. I do not deny that. I do not know; but I fear that nations abroad, who will look askance upon the growth of business in this country at the expense of foreign countries in dealing in the foreign trade, will think this bill is passed now with this provision in it because we think they are not now able to protect themselves, and that they will have a very strong feeling against us for that reason.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied five minutes.

Mr. MANN. If we keep our heads, if we keep cool, if we do not become hysterical, if we keep nonpartisan in the war that is now occurring, the prosperity of the world will largely fall into our laps. The civilization of the world depends on the attitude which the United States of America takes in the present contest, and we must preserve our temper and preserve the civilization which is coming down to us. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak further upon this question, and I would not if it were not for a statement made by the gentleman from Texas, my good friend Judge HARDY. He said in his argument that this bill would not do away with the Chinese crew. If that be true, I am greatly disappointed and can not see the purpose of the bill. I can not understand if we are not going to do away with the cheap crews why we should at this inopportune time, as called to your attention by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], pass a bill that is going to be looked upon with suspicion by every other nation of the world. What are we going to accomplish by it if we are not going to be rid of the cheap crews? Nobody objects to that portion of the bill that is going to free the American sailor. I thought, when the gentleman was making his speech, that he should have been fair enough to the American people to say that as far as the coastwise trade was concerned a law abolishing imprisonment for desertion has been on the statute books for many years.

The gentleman from Texas says the reason why the free-ship clause in the Panama Canal bill failed is because we did not admit those ships to the coastwise trade. What my distinguished friend wishes, is to admit foreign-built ships to the coastwise trade. If we did that, and if ever again unfortunately such a condition should come upon us as there is to-day, we could not even send a vessel from New York to Philadelphia. Such action would destroy our shipyards and place the coastwise trade in the same condition we are in to-day on the high seas. That would be the result of admitting foreign-built cheap ships to the coastwise trade, and the foreigners would control that trade as completely as they do to-day on the high seas.

I am sorry the gentleman from Texas injected politics into his argument; but having done so, I can not refrain from calling attention to the fact that he blamed the Republican Party for conditions that exist to-day—and we are largely responsible for it, for my party should have corrected that condition long ago. Many in this House remember that when the Republican Party was in power we did pass a bill through this House. It went to the Senate and it was not defeated by votes; it was defeated by a filibuster by two Democratic Senators. If that bill had been on the statute books to-day, we would have had at least 50 great steamers on the Atlantic Ocean that could bring our stranded people home from Europe. We would also have had several lines on the Pacific.

I want to call the attention of my distinguished friend from Texas to the fact that the only vessels to-day under the American flag, running between this country and Europe, are running under a subsidy law that was placed on the statute books by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President. What man in this Nation to-day regrets that that subsidy law is on the statute books? What man dare advocate that this subsidy law be repealed, the law that has kept upon the seas the only vessels which we have under the American flag, running across the Atlantic Ocean? [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, in the short time at my disposal it will be impossible for me to discuss all the provisions of this bill. I believe it is one of the most important measures that has come before this House for consideration. I am of the opinion that the Members of the House, instead of carrying on a filibuster against its passage, should be doing everything in their power to bring about the enactment of this proposed legislation.

The bill before us does not meet with my entire approval, but there are so many good provisions in it I will vote for it, and sincerely trust that the Members of the House will vote for the motion to suspend the rules and pass this measure to-day, thus sending it to conference, where the small inequities which are in it may be straightened out. I am confident that the conferees will report back to this House an amended bill which we will all be satisfied with.

The provisions of the measure under consideration, freeing the seamen from some of the wrongs under which they are compelled to labor, assuring them a greater degree of protection, and giving the traveling public the safety so justly desired, merits the vote of every Member of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the allotted time will not permit me to say anything further in connection with this important matter. However, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a petition presented to the President of the United States bearing on this subject [applause]:

BOSTON, June 4, 1914.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Mr. President, on behalf of the seamen of the United States we respectfully bring to your attention the following statement, prepared at the Eighteenth Convention of the International Seamen's Union of America, held at Boston, Mass., June 1–6, 1914, explaining why we believe the seamen's bill, S. 136, should be enacted into law without further delay.

The bill, Senate 136, which passed the Senate on the 23d day of October last and which is now pending in the House of Representatives, is substantially the same as H. R. 23673, which passed the House in the last Congress, except that the present bill, S. 136, has a new clause requiring sufficient lifeboats for passenger vessels.

In the report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, May 2, 1912, after exhaustive hearings in which all objections were given consideration, the bill is described as follows:

"First. It will give freedom to the sailors.

"Second. It will promote safety at sea.

"Third. It will equalize the operating expenses of foreign and domestic vessels engaged in our over-sea trade and tend to build up our merchant marine."

In our country seamen are the only persons who may be punished for violation of a civil contract to labor by being arrested as deserters—except in the domestic trade—detained, and finally delivered back to the ship or sentenced to a term in prison for the simple act of quitting the service of an employer.

Modern education and this ancient status exist together. The native American, therefore, has left the sea to such an extent that few now remain, and the white man everywhere is leaving because of the taint of slavery which extends in its influences even into the exempted portions of the calling.

Congress should abolish the slave laws. Let American freedom extend to the decks of the American ship; let American soil become free soil for seamen as it is for all other men; then the United States will have the pick of the world's best seamen while it is developing a much-needed native personnel, a body of native American seamen owing allegiance to our flag and to none other. In short, Congress should enact Senate bill 136.

The hours of labor are discretionary with the owner and master. The seamen must work until exhausted or go to prison for "disobedience to lawful command."

Twelve hours' work every day, seven days a week, at sea, is the minimum often exceeded. In port, 15 or 18 hours a day, sometimes 30 to 40 hours at a stretch are required. Then the vessel proceeds to sea, and, without intervening rest, the men begin their sea watches.

Men who work thus are too much exhausted to attend to safety of ship and passengers. Yet in this condition they go to the lookout, to the wheel, and to other work upon which the safety of all depends.

Men on shore demand and often get the eight-hour day and the six-day working week. Seamen ask simply watch and watch at sea (two on deck, three in fireroom), and a nine-hour workday in port, except in emergencies. Such regulations are provided for in Senate bill 136.

Safety at sea, as everywhere else, depends either upon self-interest or upon law. The present insurance system and the laws limiting liability of shipowners to freight money pending and proceeds from sale of wreck has eliminated self-interest and legal responsibility on the part of the owners except as noted below. Safety, therefore, can only be attained through laws compelling the necessary safeguards.

The courts in the case of In re Pacific Mail Steamship Co. denied the benefits of limited liability because of the proven incompetency of the crew. Such proof is very difficult to make, and the question can not be raised until after the disaster. Shipowners avoid the whole point by organizing one corporation for each vessel, the wreck of which destroys the assets.

At present the shipowner may send his vessel to sea with a crew not one of whom, except the few licensed officers, has had any experience or can understand orders. There is now no limit to the number of passenger decks above the water line, nor to the number of passengers a vessel may carry in the domestic trade, except the conscience of the local inspector, pressed to the limit by the power and persuasion of the shipowners. Thus there is undermanning and lack of skill in the crew, and in many instances dangerous overcrowding of passengers.

Senate bill 136 regulates this by requiring a percentage of able seamen on all vessels over 100 tons; that there shall be two such men, or men of higher rating, for each lifeboat on passenger vessels; that 75 per cent of the crew in all departments must be able to understand orders of the ship's officers, and by basing the number of passengers upon the number and capacity of seaworthy lifeboats.

Opponents of Senate bill 136 claim that some vessels can not carry a sufficient number of lifeboats on account of lack of space. That is true only in cases where steamers are now dangerously overcrowded. If lifeboats are necessary for a part of the passengers and crew, why not for all?

There should be no exemption of the coastwise trade, the Great Lakes, or of bays and sounds. The Great Lakes, for instance, have within the past few months again proven among the most dangerous waters in the world.

Proximity to land, except it be river banks or harbor docks, is not an element of safety. There is the added danger of a lee shore and of crowded navigation.

"Reaching land" means beaching the vessel, and is only done in hopes of saving a few when otherwise all would perish. She may ground in from 12 to 20 feet of water a hundred fathoms to a mile distant from land, or the shore may be steep and rocky. But a collision or a fire may make "reaching land" impossible.

On excursion steamers the greatest danger is from fire. "Beach her, put on life preservers, and jump overboard" is the "safety" offered by opponents of the bill. But how can help then be given without lifeboats?

Assuming that all the "women and children first" have jumped overboard, how long can they remain in the water without perishing? Of whose children were the shipowners thinking when they urged this as a means of safety, and what children were the inspectors considering when they accepted it?

No one will claim it is safe to crowd people into a theater or a shirtwaist factory and then to lock the doors.

Is it not even more dangerous to jam a steamer full of passengers and then to send it out of harbor without having on board the means whereby they may be taken off quickly and safely in case of need? Whether it be an ocean liner or an excursion steamer, the necessity is the same, in that there should be lifeboats for all and skilled men to handle such boats. Other means are of little avail.

Permit us to say here, however, that the great majority of seamen are employed on cargo vessels that do not carry passengers; and cargo vessels, whether sail or steam, regardless of the route, distance from shore, or the season, always carry sufficient lifeboats for all on board. It is only passenger vessels, with their loads of men, women, and children, that do not carry lifeboats for all. To us as seamen, if we thought only of our own interests, a few lifeboats and a few able seamen, more or less, on passenger vessels would make little difference. But we know the danger, and believe it our duty to tell the whole truth about existing conditions on board ship, and to urge as strongly as we can the legislation needed.

Inefficiency in the engine department, aside from its dangers, lessens speed, increases repair expense and consumption of fuel, and is therefore a constant appeal to self-interest.

Service in kitchen and saloon determines comfort; inefficiency there, being continuously apparent, results in loss of patronage, and is guarded against accordingly.

The steadily growing inefficiency in the deck crew results in the increasing loss of life and property. Here the shipowner is secured by insurance and limitation of liability. Lloyd's underwriters faced $35,000,000 liability in year just ended. Safety depends at all times upon the human element, at sea more than elsewhere.

The deck duty is so varied and crowded with emergencies that down through the times four years' experience on deck was required as training for the rating of able seaman. British and Norwegian commissions dealing with existing conditions recommended that a standard of three years' experience on deck be set by law. This now is the law in Great Britain, Germany, Australia, New Zealand, and is the standard set by Senate 136. Safety of the vessel, which is the primary need, requires a sufficient number of these men to attend to their duties without overwork.

When a ship must be abandoned the only safety is in lifeboats, the average crew of which is seven or more. At least two of the men in each lifeboat must have the highest skill and calmest judgment attained by seamen for the purpose of lowering the boat, getting away from the ship's side, attending to the sea anchor, using the steering oar, and guiding the work of the others. Such knowledge and training can not be obtained in the saloon or fireroom or from any occasional "drill." Nor can men from the hot fireroom or sheltered saloon, scantily clothed, long endure the exposure in the bow or stern of a lifeboat.

The sailors' daily work in all kinds of vessels and weather, at the wheel, on the lookout, and on deck teaches them to know the sea and how to work with it. Their work with tackles, lines, and cables, in hoisting and lowering, trains their judgment of strains and distances. Up to their number they are now distributed amongst the lifeboats when all the boats are needed, and they are always the crew of the emergency boat for rescue work at sea.

The claim that able seamen, to qualify under Senate bill 136, are not available is not based on fact. The fact is that the average shipowner now refuses to employ a sufficient number of able seamen for reasonable safety at sea. But he eagerly accepts them into harbor gangs, where, with the skill gained at sea, they prevent much damage in the shipping, hoisting and lowering of expensive and heavy merchandise. Marine insurance covers freight only when it is in the vessel.

After the Titanic disaster, under pressure of public opinion and for the purposes of advertisement, the number and capacity of lifeboats were increased in the North Atlantic trade in advance of legal requirements. In other trades no change came until the promulgation of new rules. But in no trade was the number of men increased, and the skill is lower than it was five years ago.

In every large city will be found many men who have left the sea in rebellion at the conditions imposed and who have found that on shore the skill acquired at sea enables them to earn wages that permit of family life.

The real opposition to Senate bill 136 is not because of the increase in size of deck crew. In more than 90 per cent of the vessels no increase in the number will be required. But inexperienced men will be replaced by able seamen, who, having greater skill, will require higher wages.

At present the controlling thought in navigation is cheapness. To get cheap men and to hold them the shipowners insist upon paying wages before they are earned, upon denying part payment in port after it is earned, upon involuntary labor, and imprisonment for desertion. Thus they retard the natural development of skilled seamen and steadily force self-respecting men from the sea.

This must be reversed or shortly there will be no Caucasian seamen. "The prompt alleviation of the very unsafe, unjust, and burdensome conditions which now surround the employment of sailors and render it extremely difficult to obtain the services of spirited and competent men, such as every ship needs if it is to be safely handled and brought to port," must be attained through law. Such law must be made applicable to all vessels sailing in and out of the ports of our country in order to equalize the wage cost of operation or we shall never have a national merchant marine or seamen available for our Navy.

Under treaties and statutes our Government now uses its police powers, at the request of foreign shipowners, to capture and return seamen who attempt to quit the service of their ships. It is by this means that the wage rate of foreign ships is forcibly kept lower than that prevailing at American ports.

This marks the one advantage which foreign ships now hold over the American ships in the foreign trade, and which prevents the proper growth of our merchant marine. Other conditions have been equalized.

The building cost was equalized by a clause in the Panama Canal act, permitting American register to foreign-built ships for purposes of the foreign trade.

The cost of supplies is equal to all. An American ship trading between New York and Antwerp, for instance, purchases her supplies in Antwerp if the cost there is lower than in New York.

The remaining item, and the most important, is that of labor cost on the vessel itself, i. e., the wages of the crew. If conditions can be brought about whereby the wage cost of operation will be equalized, the development of our merchant marine and our sea power will be unhampered.

This is within the power of our Government. The present situation is entirely artificial. The remedy is to set free the economic laws governing wages, economic laws which, in their application to seamen, are now obstructed by treaties and statute law.

There has been a very common misapprehension that wages of seamen depend upon the flag under which they work. Their wages depend upon the port in which they are hired and sign shipping articles, regardless of the nationality of the vessel, and the wages in that port depend upon the standards of living in the country where the port is located. In other words, the economic law governing wages of seamen is exactly the same as that governing wages of any other class of workers.

Imagine two ships, one flying the American flag and the other a foreign flag, moored at the same dock in New York. The crew of the American vessel has been hired in New York at American wages; that of the foreign ship at some low-wage port in the Mediterranean. The two crews come into contact, each discovering the wages and conditions of the other.

What is the natural result? Unless prevented by force, the crew of the foreign vessel would either get the same wages as paid on the American vessel or they would quit. The foreigner would then have to hire a new crew at the wages of the port, not as the result of any organized action by the men, but as the result of individual desire inherent in human nature.

The foreign owner would have gained no advantage by his refusal to pay the higher wages to the crew he brought here. Under such conditions ordinary business sense would quickly induce him to pay his crew in accordance with American standards, in advance of arrival in an American port, as the only way to retain their services and thus avoid the cost involved in delaying his vessel for a new crew.

In 1884 Congress enacted a law intended to enable American shipowners to hire their crews in foreign ports where wages were lowest and to hold these crews in American ports where wages were higher. It was an attempt to force wages down to the foreign standard, but it failed to accomplish its purpose. The whole pressure of American life was against it.

The way to successfully equalize the wage cost of operation is to permit the men on all vessels in our ports to release themselves instead of assisting shipowners to forcibly hold them. Equalization will then follow a natural course upward to the higher level in response to economic conditions. Equalization downward by artificial means is impossible, and results only in men quitting the sea.

Congress should reassert and maintain domestic jurisdiction over all vessels in our ports, enact standards of safety and skill based upon American conceptions, equally applicable to all, and kept under control of our own Government, thus depriving foreign vessels of any special privileges. The wage cost of operation will be equalized and so remain, and there will be no need of subsidies to rebuild the American merchant marine.

American shipowners having money invested in foreign ships, with their partners the European shipowners, understand this to be the inevitable result of Senate bill 136. It will give real American ships proper opportunities in the foreign trade. That is why they oppose it.

This can not be done, however, if the pending international convention on safety of life at sea is ratified. That convention is in direct conflict with the purposes of the seamen's bill. It does not provide adequate safety regulations; it legalizes some of the very worst of existing practices in the matter of equipment; it permits of the employment of the cheapest and least effective men; it makes no provision whatsoever for skilled seamen in the deck crews; it makes doubtful the right of the United States to abrogate that part of existing treaties under which seamen on our shores are now treated as slaves; it permits of overcrowding in immigrant vessels, because it interferes with the passenger act of 1882; it is a concession to foreign ship-owning interests, in that it gives up, in a large measure, the control which our Government now has a right to exercise over vessels of all nations when in American waters; and it will cede to foreign nations a commercial advantage which will prevent the United States from building up a merchant marine that can compete with the vessels of other nations for the over-sea trade of the world.

We ask your assistance, Mr. President, to prevent the ratification of the proposed treaty and to secure the passage of the seamen's bill.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we should keep in mind that the purposes of this legislation are to secure the freedom of seamen, to secure safety at sea for the traveling public, and to promote the American merchant marine by equalizing the cost of operation of American and foreign ships trading from and to American ports. The question has been fairly well presented, and it will be impossible for me to say all that I could say as to the importance of this legislation. In passing I want to say, however, that within the next hour I hope, if some one does not make the point of order of no quorum, that this bill will have passed the House, and when it has, then organized labor's grievances, presented to Congress and the President in 1907, will be wiped off the slate, and I desire to thank the House of Congress for their favorable consideration of remedial legislation directly affecting labor.

It has been said here by some that the abrogation or amendment of treaties due to the passage of this bill may complicate us with foreign nations. It has been said by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that Japan is going to become aggrieved, and we will probably come into conflict with her. It seems to me that neither Japan nor any other nation would be justified in complaining when we pass legislation that equalizes conditions under which ships from all nations operate trading to and from American ports.

In regard to complications with other nations it is well known that organized labor sincerely desires the passage of this legislation. Organized labor has always and everywhere exercised its influence for peace and to prevent war. Organized labor does not desire legislation that will complicate this country in war with any other nation, and we believe there is no opportunity for it at this time, because legislation of this sort is going to uplift the condition of foreign workmen as well as the American seamen.

It is to be hoped that the conferees of the Senate and the House together will succeed in agreeing to a report which will finally make a practical, workable, efficient law.

The differences between the Senate bill and the committee substitute are of such nature that there is ample opportunity for an agreement such as will accomplish the purposes intended and results desired. I have confidence that the conferees will come to such understanding and agreement.

The two bills are alike in this, that they repeal statutes and provide a means of abrogating or amending treaties under which American seamen are arrested, detained, and surrendered back to their vessels under treaties with foreign nations, and under which the United States arrests, detains, and delivers to their vessels any foreign seamen who may desert; that is, violate their contract to labor within the jurisdiction of the United States. They are further alike in this, that the seamen on foreign vessels in American ports and American seamen in foreign ports have a right to demand and receive one-half of the wages earned, excepting in this, that the Senate bill provides that the money shall be paid within two days after demand therefor in any port where a vessel loads and discharges cargo, while the substitute has no such provision, but provides that such demand may not be made oftener than every sixth day. Thus the substitute may be so construed that half pay may be withheld until the vessel is about to leave, thus leaving no time to have the right enforced.

The Senate bill provides for the absolute prohibition against payment of advance or allotment to original creditor and makes it applicable to all vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States. The substitute adds the following proviso:

Provided, That treaties in force between the United States and foreign nations do not conflict therewith.

It is to be hoped that the conferees will strike this proviso out, because it will permit some merchant vessels to pay advance in ports of the United States while it will be prohibited to American vessels and to some foreign vessels, and the vessels who have this right will always be able to obtain cheaper crews than those who have not. It is a special privilege conferred upon some nations' vessels that will work to the disadvantage of other nations' vessels, including American vessels, and it is a serious and crying evil under which the seamen have too long suffered and under which the crimping system has flourished. To strike it out means equalizing the condition to all vessels and to wipe out the crimping system in so far as American ports are concerned. (Section 11, p. 35.)

Section 1 in the Senate bill is sections 1 and 2 in the substitute. Section 2 of the substitute deals with the hours of labor and working conditions, both at sea and in port. The exemption of bays or sounds, on page 22, line 19, will, unless modified or stricken out, permit the undermanning and overworking of a large number of vessels trading along the coast. Bays and sounds are indefinite terms. A bay may be nearly sheltered or wide open to the ocean. It may be small or large. One need but look at the map of the United States to realize that this expression should be stricken out. It was evidently put in to preserve the present working conditions in those places, but the present working condition has been responsible in the past for such disasters as the General Slocum, the Monroe, and others.

The Senate bill provides that there shall be no unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays. The committee substitute provides specific days as holidays, leaving out very many State holidays. This will cause friction that might much better be avoided by permitting to the men the enjoyment of such holidays as shall be celebrated in ports of the United States where the vessel happens to be at the time.

Section 13 of the substitute corresponds to section 12 of the Senate bill. In dealing with individual efficiency the difference between the two does not seem material; but in the matter of safety the difference is so great that I should hesitate to vote for the bill, if I did not believe that the committee of conference will deal with this matter from the point of view solely of the safety of the traveling public.

The Senate bill provides lifeboats for all and two able seamen or men of higher rating for each lifeboat. The substitute leaves this matter out of section 13 and introduces a section 14, in which it seems to deal with vessels of the United States. And then it goes on to determine what is a seaworthy lifeboat, what is a proper pontoon raft, the number of boats that are to be carried, the number of rafts that are to be carried, specifying the waters and treating the open sea differently within the 20-mile limit than outside of the 20-mile limit; permitting vessels within the 20-mile limit a certain time of the year—that is, from May 15 to September 15—to run with 30 per cent of its passengers and crew without either boats or rafts. For the same period it provides 20 per cent of boats, 30 per cent of rafts, and 50 per cent of the passengers to be without either means of safety on the Lakes. And this in spite of the experience of the Monroe, the Empress of Ireland, and the tremendous losses of human life on the Lakes within the last five years.

In place of two able seamen or men of higher rating for each boat there is, on pages 65 and 66, a provision for what is called

"certificated lifeboatmen." This is an innovation on shipboard, so radical and fraught with such consequences, both from the point of view of safety and of discipline, that I look upon it with the greatest apprehension. The preparation and training of the certificated lifeboatmen is such that the qualifications may be attained after a week's training in smooth-water drilling with an empty boat, manifestly an ineffective preparation for the most difficult and most important of the work that a seaman has to perform, namely, the saving of human life in case of disaster. Industrially and from the point of view of discipline I feel sure that the burden upon the shipowner will be greater under the substitute than under the Senate bill, and I do hope that both for the sake of safety to the public and expense to the shipowner the conferees may give to this particular point earnest and painstaking consideration.

On page 67 "a licensed officer or able seaman" is to be placed in charge of every boat or raft. This means that an engineer will be placed in charge of a lifeboat. There is nothing in his work that prepares him for this. It will be done over his protest and to the serious endangering of human life. It should read a licensed deck officer or able seaman. There surely ought at least to be one man in the boat who is accustomed to the sea and knows enough about it to work with it for the safety of himself and those who are in the boat with him.

I here desire to insert an editorial from the Washington Times, July 20, 1914, and also an article from the Chicago Herald, July 18, 1914:

[From the Washington Times, Monday, July 20, 1914.]

THE "MASSACHUSETTS" FIRE.

The Massachusetts was on fire in New York Harbor. If the fire had broken out a few hours later, with no fire boats in the vicinity, the 900 persons on board might have had only the choice of burning or drowning. As it was, it came very near being another Slocum. In the opinion of those who gave the assistance, the vessel's crew could not have conquered the flames.

Upon whom would the responsibility in such case have rested?

Congress has absolute and exclusive jurisdiction, and Congress, therefore, can not escape complete responsibility.

That vessels are underequipped in actual life-saving appliances is no longer in dispute.

One question is, Shall this condition be permitted to continue?

The other is, To what extent shall boats be furnished?

Third, Shall the vessel be sufficiently manned to meet emergencies, and, if necessary, to lower the boats and get them away from the ship?

About 6,000 persons have lost their lives in passenger vessels in the last half decade. More than two years have passed since the sinking of the Titanic. Very few know how long it is since the burning of the Slocum. The sinking of the Empress of Ireland was but the other day.

Congress has all the information. Investigation after investigation develops the same sordid facts—underequipment, undermanning; and in this case it is stated that the crew could not have conquered the flames.

In the meantime, the seamen's bill is slumbering on the calendar, after having been emasculated in the committee.

There is no telling how quickly we shall witness the horrors of another Slocum, another Titanic, or another Empress. The people are beginning to understand, and will place the blame where it belongs. Members of Congress will have to account to their constituents and to the people as a whole until such means of safety as can be provided by law are commanded.

[From the Chicago Herald, July 18, 1914.]

EXCURSION BOATS HELD MENACE TO THE YOUNG—PERSONAL SAFETY AND MORAL WELFARE ENDANGERED, SAYS REPORT TO BODINE—BOYS AND GIRLS DRUNK—GAMBLING FLOURISHES AND LIQUOR LAWS ARE IGNORED, SAY INVESTIGATORS.

Conditions that are a menace to the personal safety and moral welfare of Chicago school children exist on Lake Michigan excursion boats, according to a report submitted yesterday to Peter Reinberg, president of the board of education, by W. L. Bodine, head of the compulsory education department of the board.

Gambling flourishes openly, he says, and intoxicating liquors are sold to minors without regard for the law. Rowdies are permitted to insult women and children, and a clique of young men infest the boats who look upon unescorted girls as legitimate prey, according to the report.

Mr. Bodine's findings are based upon information gathered by a corps of investigators who rode on the boats plying out of Chicago from June 29 until July 8.

FINDS GIRLS DRUNK.

The report says, in part:

"Boys only 17 years of age and girls under 16 were found drunk during a Fourth of July crush.

"A vicious and degenerate element travels on some of the boats, including a clique of young men who look upon unescorted girls as legitimate prey. Some women, on the other hand, have developed the 'excursion' habit to lure susceptible youths.

"Anyone with the price can obtain a drink or a stateroom on the average steamer, the only exception being the Eastland, which has no staterooms.

"Petty gambling, slot machines, wheel and paddle games, and raffles are in full operation on most boats. They are merely marine kindergartens of gambling. A system of mean gambling exists, in which a second-grade child with a nickel or a dime in hand is permitted to take the first lesson if he is big enough to toddle to the front with the small change.

"Poker games, with money in sight, were among the features on one Fourth of July excursion.

CHILDREN DRINK BEER.

"Boys and girls between 15 and 17 years old openly drank beer between Chicago and Michigan City. On the return trip two couples, both under 18 years and intoxicated, sat in the stern of the boat, the boys sitting on the girls' laps.

"On the dance floor there was no restriction to any kind of dancing, and a number of young persons under the influence of liquor were on the floor.

"The stateroom patronage on most of the daylight boats was brisk, especially on the return trips.

"Personal safety of passengers is imperiled by the limited supply of lifeboats and lift rafts on the average excursion boats. Life preservers are available, but many of them are stored on deck ceilings beyond the reach of women and children or even men of short stature. The staterooms are, of course, supplied with life preservers, but are locked up except when the staterooms are in use.

"The question of police jurisdiction beyond the 3-mile limit places the remedy in the hands of the companies operating these boats. The question of patronage rests with the public."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by my esteemed friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] with reference to the Pacific coast, I think I should make this statement: If his contention is true—that in the event this bill becomes a law it will give the trade upon the Pacific to the Japanese—I do not know why that should be any occasion for complaint on the part of the Japanese or be cause for war. The language test applied to the Japanese crew would be no embarrassment, because the officers and the crew are of the same nationality and speak the same language, and the crew would certainly be able to understand the orders of the officers. They would not have any trouble in complying with the language test. As applied to American ships it will be different. The officers of American ships must be American citizens. Presumably they speak the English language. If ships flying the American flag employ Chinese or Japanese crews, the crews must either understand the language of the officers or officers must be able to understand the language of the crews sufficiently to impart their orders to the crews in Japanese or Chinese.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. For a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What I was trying to say was that the mustering of the crew was to ascertain whether they complied with our requirements not only in regard to language, but there are many other requirements in order to show qualification, and it provides, as I understand, upon the filing of an affidavit by any reputable citizen, that the collector of customs shall cause the crew to be mustered, and the ship shall not be permitted to depart until it is shown that they have complied with every law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true, so far as mustering the crew is concerned, and applies to all ships. In England they have enforced the law from time immemorial, that no ship shall leave their ports in an unseaworthy condition, and to be in a seaworthy condition the ship must have a sufficient and efficient crew, and the muster means no more than that it may be shown that the ship had in her crew enough officers and seamen for her safe navigation; the seamen to be of the rating prescribed by section 13; that is to say, at the end of one year 40 per cent, at the end of two years 45 per cent, at the end of three years 50 per cent, and after four years 65 per cent of the crew should be able seamen, as defined in this law.

Since the gentleman from Washington has raised the question as to the muster of the crew, it may be well to explain that provision of section 13 more in detail, so that we may fully understand its scope and the reason for the requirement. Section 13 provides that no vessel of 100 tons gross, with certain exceptions named, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she meets the following requirements: First, she shall have on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which in each department thereof are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel; second, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices, are of a rating of not less than able seamen.

The section defines the persons entitled to the rating of able seaman as follows: For service on the seas a person must be 19 years old or upward and shall have had at least 3 years' service on deck on a vessel or vessels to which the section applies. For service on the Great Lakes and other lakes and on the bays and sounds a person must be 19 years old or upward and shall have had at least 24 months' service on deck on such vessels.

It is made the duty of the Department of Commerce to prescribe rules for the examination of those who seek a rating as able seaman as to their eyesight, hearing, and physical condition. Provision is also made for a rating of able seaman for those who have served 12 months at sea who upon examination under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce as to eyesight, hearing, physical condition, and knowledge of the duties of seamanship may be found competent.

The foregoing provisions should be read and considered in connection with the provisions of section 4463 of the Revised Statutes, which provide as follows:

Any vessel of the United States subject to the provisions of this title or to the inspection laws of the United States shall not be navigated unless she shall have in her service and on board such complement of licensed officers and crew as may, in the judgment of the local inspectors who inspect the vessel, be necessary for her safe navigation.

Now, to illustrate. If the local inspectors should designate a crew of 40, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices, in all the departments of the vessel as necessary for the safe navigation of the vessel, it would be necessary for at least 75 per cent of the crew in each department to understand any order given by the officers of the vessel; in other words, to stand the language test. If 20 of the 40 members of the crew are designated for the deck department, then in the first year 8, in the second 9, in the third 10, in the fourth 11, and thereafter 13 of the deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices, must be of a rating of not less than able seaman.

The only limitation upon the power of the local inspectors to designate the complement of the crew, in addition to licensed officers, necessary for the safe navigation of the vessel is found in section 14 of the bill, which provides that a licensed officer or able seaman shall be placed in charge of each lifeboat or pontoon raft. No one interested in safety of life at sea can complain of this provision. Now, the provision of section 13 to which the gentleman from Washington refers, and has expressed the opinion that it may cause friction and vexatious delay to vessels seeking clearance from our ports, does no more than insure obedience to the law. It provides that the collector of customs may on his own motion, and shall on the sworn information of a reputable citizen of the United States, cause a muster of the crew of the vessel to be made that it may be determined whether or not the law is being complied with; and to prevent the vexation and delay to which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] refers, it is expressly provided that the collector shall not be required to cause the muster of the crew to be made unless the sworn information is filed with him at least six hours before the vessel departs or is scheduled to depart. It would seem that the provision requiring six hours' notice would be sufficient to deter anyone from making the complaint unless for good cause, and especially as it is further provided that anyone knowingly making a false affidavit for such purpose shall be guilty of perjury. There may be other provisions of the bill about which there may be confusion or misunderstanding, but I do not feel that it is necessary for me to notice them here. My colleagues on the committee who have spoken have gone into the various provisions of the bill in such detail and have explained them so clearly that it is unnecessary to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker will pardon me, I desire to yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD], which I omitted to do.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, a few years ago the Masters, Mates, and Pilots' Association of New Jersey did me the honor to elect me the first honorary member of their association, and they have unanimously indorsed this Alexander seamen's bill. Though they are not connected with the other association so ably presided over by my good friend from California, Mr. Furuseth, they are in sympathy with the movement that he has so well in hand for the care and protection of men who risk their lives upon the high seas. I desire to compliment the able chairman of this committee and the membership of the committee under him on this magnificent bill, and I hope now that it will be speedily enacted into law. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Speaker two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed. [Applause.]

GEORGE P. HEARD (H. DOC. NO. 1152).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read as follows and ordered to be printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 2728, entitled "An act for the relief of George P. Heard," because I believe that its enactment into law would be gravely demoralizing to the administration of the discipline of the Army.

No injustice was done Dr. Heard. The findings of the board of examiners were twice carefully reviewed. Unless all others who similarly fail are to be granted the same special privilege contemplated in this bill, a grave injustice will have been committed. It would constitute a precedent that would most certainly plague both the Department of War and the Congress. It would tend to nullify the good effects of the excellent act of Congress whose purpose was to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army. It would unfairly affect all the officers who have come into the service since the honorable discharge of Dr. Heard by reducing them one file each.

I can not see my way to giving the bill my approval. Special favors, it seems to me, ought very carefully to be avoided in the administration of the Army and Navy of the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 27, 1914.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to make any motion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire before making the motion to adjourn to announce to the House——

Mr. MANN. This message has to be disposed of in some way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not understand the Speaker's remark. Mr. Speaker, I move the message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the message and bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take up the conference report on the bill H. R. 7967——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understood we were going to adjourn.

Mr. MOON (continuing). To amend an act creating a postal savings system.

Mr. MANN. We understood we were going to adjourn. There is a little time wanted on that, and it can come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, very well; if the gentleman from Illinois desires some discussion on the matter and is not prepared for it this evening I will withdraw the motion until to-morrow.

WAR-RISKS INSURANCE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that an effort will be made to take up a rule to pass the emergency insurance bill, and I hope that the Members of the House will be in their seats at 12 o'clock to-morrow to save a roll call. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, August 28, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Also, petition of 600 members of the Homestead Loan and Building Association, of Albion, Mich., protesting against a stamp tax on building and loan mortgages, releases, and discharges; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WATSON: Petitions of sundry citizens of Brunswick, Sussex, and Mecklenburg Counties, all in the State of Virginia, asking an investigation of the Milliken bill, relative to a personal rural-credit system; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 28, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 15657.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment of the committee on page 27.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the unanimous-consent agreement which was submitted yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Overman	Sterling
Bryan	Kenyon	Perkins	Thomas
Burton	Kern	Shafroth	Townsend
Chilton	Lane	Sheppard	Vardaman
Culberson	Lea, Tenn.	Simmons	Walsh
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.	White
Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Johnson	Nelson	Smoot

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

I wish also to announce that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is necessarily absent, and that he is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] on account of illness and of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. REED, and Mr. THORNTON answered to their names when called.

Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. WEST, and Mr. DILLINGHAM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to announce the continued absence of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate heretofore given, and request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. BRADY, Mr. COLT, and Mr. GORE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Texas presents a proposed unanimous-consent agreement which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, August 29, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think I am prepared to consent to that. There are, as is well known, a large number of amendments to be proposed to this bill after the committee amendments shall have been concluded. We have not yet concluded the committee amendments. All the intervening time might be consumed in discussing them. Some important amendments are to be proposed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that we are practically through with committee amendments; we ought to get through with them in an hour. Then we shall have all of to-day and until 2 o'clock to-morrow to discuss the bill generally, and after that to discuss the bill and amendments under the 15-minute rule.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the Senator that he present the request later in the day, when we shall know more about the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri object?

Mr. REED. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is on page 27. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 18, page 27, line 22, the committee propose to strike out the word "unlawful" and to insert "to be violations of the antitrust laws."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I am in favor of some substantive declaration, such as is included in this paragraph; but I do not favor the broad declaration that nothing shall be considered or held to be unlawful, for that might be construed into a declaration of the United States affecting State laws, which we have no authority under the Constitution to make. I therefore move, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out the words "the antitrust laws" and to insert "any law of the United States."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the last three words at the end of the amendment, being "the antitrust laws," and to insert "any law of the United States"; so that if amended it will read:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the effect of this last clause as the House sent it to us. I referred to it in a question propounded to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on yesterday.

The first portion of this paragraph, in lines 4 and 5, declares that—

No restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment.

Therefore, if an employer desired to terminate a contract of employment he is not to be restrained or enjoined from doing so; and this is one of the acts specified in the paragraph. The last clause, which we are now considering, adds:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

That is to say, the act first named of terminating an employment shall not be held to be unlawful. The employer may have contracts with one man or with many men for 12 months; he may terminate these contracts; and his violation of his contract in terminating the employment which he has contracted to continue for a term shall not be considered or held to be unlawful. This last clause, if allowed to remain as the other House sent it to us, would go to that extent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, would not that equally apply to the employee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If there is an adjudication of the difficulties of the employer and the employee and arrangements made whereby they shall accept a certain wage and conditions of employment, say for 12 months, under this provision that could be absolutely ignored.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly; but I was dwelling upon the effect upon the employee, because I was seeking to appeal to those who are especially moved by a desire to serve the employee, and I desired to point out how this language affected the employee.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that it has been held over and over again that language of that kind would not in any way affect the civil rights of the parties. The first resort of either an employee or an employer whose contract had been violated would be an action to enforce his civil rights. At one time we tried to rely on a statute in the State of New Jersey providing that certain acts were not unlawful, but we were enjoined from doing that on the ground that though they were not unlawful they were the subject of civil contract, that an injunction proceeding was not a criminal proceeding, and that the contract held. There is no difficulty about that. I will say to the Senator that so far as the working people of the United States are concerned he need have no tremors on their account. With reference to that language, they understand the import of it, so far as it affects them, and they are willing to stand and abide by it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not recognize the right of the Senator from New Jersey to speak for the working people of the United States any more than I do, and I do not agree with him in his conclusion. There are about as many working people in my State as there are in New Jersey, and I can not vote for a measure which permits a violation of their contracts.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will permit me, I am not asking him to agree with my conclusions, but I am calling his attention to the fact that the courts have so decided in a case in which I, as attorney, represented the laboring people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know the case to which the Senator refers; but if language means anything, this language means what I have said it means. It provides that the acts enumerated in the paragraph "shall not be considered or held unlawful." Your civil right depends upon an unlawful action; your civil right to sue for a breach of your contract of employment is due to the fact that it is unlawful to break a contract of employment. This provision says that such acts shall not be considered or held unlawful. What does that mean? It has no reference to a criminal prosecution. I do not know of any statute anywhere which provides for criminal prosecutions against an employer for declining to pay his employee for the length of time for which he hires him. If I employ a man to work for me for 12 months and at the end of 1 month break my contract with him and decline to employ him for the remaining 11 months, I know of no criminal statute that would punish me for it; and if my employee contracts to work for me for 12 months and at the end of 1 month he declines to work for me any longer, I know of no criminal statute that would affect it.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I will enlighten the Senator. There are criminal statutes now, and there were criminal statutes in almost every State of the Union, which would make such an act a crime if done by more than two men; and there can not be the slightest doubt that the aggrieved parties would have their civil remedies. I think I can cite him to authoritative cases, which came as far as the Supreme Court, which have so held on that particular point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; the Supreme Court of the United States, although that particular point perhaps was not raised.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from New Jersey refer to the case of Bailey against The State of Alabama?

Mr. HUGHES. I am not referring to that case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Supreme Court of the United States held that to be an unconstitutional statute.

Mr. HUGHES. I am referring to the case of Frank et al. against Herold et al., in the State of New Jersey, which went to every court in that State, and finally went to the United States Supreme Court. It was there decided upon a different ground, but the case went to the United States Supreme Court, although the particular point was not acted upon by that court. It was held, however, by every court in the State of New Jersey which passed upon the question that conduct declared to be permissible by statute could be forbidden if there was a contractual arrangement between the parties which such conduct violated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The State law of Alabama provided that a breach of contract of employment was to be treated as a crime and punishable by imprisonment. The Supreme Court of the United States held that law to be unconstitutional in the case of Bailey against The State of Alabama.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am familiar with that decision, and I think that any statute that undertook to imprison a man for a breach of a contract of employment ought to be held unconstitutional.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For it would practically amount to imprisonment for a breach of a civil contract.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it would create a reign of terror among employees wherever it was applied.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in spite of the views of the Senator from New Jersey I do not doubt the correctness of the position I have taken. I can not conceive of a court under a statute exactly like this having taken the view which the Senator from New Jersey suggests. It might possibly be held that this provision is unconstitutional, because it undertakes to violate the terms of a contract duly made; but I am not sure about that. It could only be relieved from being objectionable by being declared unconstitutional and therefore illegal. I would be utterly unwilling to join in placing upon the statute books an evil proposition in an act the evil of which could only be stopped by constructions on the part of the court setting it aside.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wants to be fair and candid. The court made no such construction as that insinuated by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not mean that the court had done so in the case to which the Senator refers, but I was giving my own construction of this provision, and I said I saw no way by which a court could set this provision aside except along the line I had suggested.

Mr. HUGHES. The court had no such difficulty as the Senator seems to have. The court differentiated very clearly between acts which were permitted and for which those who committed them could not be indicted and acts which were violative of contractual obligations. In the latter case the court held that workingmen could be held to the strict letter of that contract by means of injunctions, a violation of which resulted, as an infraction of the law would have resulted, and did result in this case, in the imprisonment of those concerned. That is the ingenious way in which the court got around the statute of New Jersey, which legalized certain acts which were afterwards enjoined. The defendants came into court and said, "We have a statute of the State of New Jersey which says that we may do these things"; but the vice chancellor of the State of New Jersey said, "It is true that no grand jury may indict you, it is true that no court of criminal jurisdiction can try you and punish you, but a court of chancery can compel you to do the things you have agreed to do, whether the contract under which you agreed to do them is express or implied; and once we have ordered you to do them you refuse to do them at your peril." They refused to do them, and it was very much at their peril.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey cite us to that decision and state where we can find it?

Mr. HUGHES. I am not like my friend from Idaho, and do not carry pages and numbers of reports in my memory; but I will try to get the decision for the Senator. I think it will be found in the New Jersey State Reports under the general heading "Frank et al. v. Herold et al." Frank & Dugan were a firm of silk manufacturers in the city of Paterson. The defendant was a man named Herold. He is an employee in the Capitol building now. The doctrine to which I have referred was laid down in the decision, as I recollect, by the vice chancellor on a motion to modify the injunction.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. HUGHES. I might say that he injected something new into the jurisprudence of the State of New Jersey in holding that it was a crime, or at least it was offensive—it was a crime except as the statute took it out of criminal acts—for one man to request another to leave his employment. He said that amounted to the common-law offense of the seduction of a servant, and he enjoined against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from New Jersey, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall be pleased to yield. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was on his feet first, but still——

Mr. BORAH. I was simply trying to get the drift of the discussion. It is difficult to hear over here.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if it be not true that in construing the last clause of section 18 it would be necessary for the court to add the words "or held unlawful under the laws of the United States" in order to render it constitutional at all?

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly. I have said that. I said that before the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator did.

Mr. HUGHES. I said that if there was any doubt in the minds of Senators I had not any thought that any action we could take here would change the laws of the various States of the Union, and I was willing then, and I am perfectly willing now, to have that language changed.

Mr. CUMMINS. That being true—and I heard the Senator from New Jersey state it before the committee—what difference is there between saying "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful under the laws of the United States" and saying "be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States"?

Mr. HUGHES. The language here is "violations of the anti-trust laws." I was not in here when any suggestion was made to change that language. I do not suppose there is any difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the proposal of the Senator from Texas, it becomes "be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States."

Mr. HUGHES. I am willing to accept that language. It was offered during my absence from the Chamber. I just came in. I had a conversation with the Senator last night, and he made some such suggestion to me, and it was satisfactory—not entirely satisfactory, I will say to the Senator, because there are decisions and court practices which attain all the dignity of law. I would have preferred the other language, but I am willing to accept this.

Mr. CUMMINS. The reason I think the language that came from the House is imperfect is this: If it be construed literally, the whole proposal falls, becomes nugatory and unconstitutional, because we can not declare that a particular act is lawful or unlawful except as a regulation of commerce among the States, and the extent of our power is to say that we do not declare it to be unlawful. We can go no further than that.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree perfectly with the Senator. Perhaps, if I had known what had occurred before I came in, I would not have entered into the discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, having yielded the floor for quite a general discussion, I wish to return to the same view that I was presenting at the time I yielded.

The Senator from New Jersey has shown no decision that would take from this language as it is contained in the bill, without amendment, its objectionable features. If any court has rendered a decision that would relieve it from the criticism I am placing upon it, I would not be willing to follow that decision. I would not be willing to place in a national statute language of this kind, relying upon the decision even of the chancellor of New Jersey.

What does the language say?—

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

This is not a criminal statute. The Senator from New Jersey thinks this language only means that no criminal procedure should be had with reference to any of these acts. It does not say so. We are prescribing no criminal penalty. We have no criminal penalty fixed by the statutes of the United States for these acts. If it was intended to apply to Federal statutes, it broadly declares that parties to a contract of employment on either side may violate that contract and that that violation shall not be held or considered to be unlawful.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in discussing this particular section with reference to what is or what is not——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. I have not yielded yet, but I will yield now.

Mr. BORAH. I thought the Senator had yielded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that it is well to keep in mind the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a willful violation of an injunction is a crime under the statutes of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But this has no reference to a willful violation of an injunction, because it begins by declaring that there shall be no restraining order or injunction issued against either of these acts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are discussing the last three or four lines of section 18.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. When we go back to the beginning of section 18, it says:

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application.

What does the Senator understand the word "property" there to mean?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not discussing that part of the section. The last clause of the paragraph has no bearing upon that portion of the section.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that it is almost necessary to know something about that in order to arrive at an intelligent conclusion as to what we should do with the last line.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not discussing that part of the section, and this language does not bear upon that part of the section. This language says:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

I am discussing the effect of this language upon the first one of the acts named in this paragraph. I am endeavoring to point out that the language at the close of the paragraph as it came to us from the House is highly objectionable. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] says that the laboring people are satisfied with it. We can not legislate because a class of people are satisfied. A class of people might be satisfied with a piece of legislation, thinking it would accomplish a certain thing, when it would not. Finally the responsibility comes to us; and even though they thought it would do a certain thing for them, if we found that it would do a very different thing to them, we would properly be responsible if we passed the legislation, though they, misapprehending its effect, were satisfied with it.

Under no circumstances could I consent to vote for a bill that undertook to say that the breaking of a contract of employment by an employer should not be considered or held unlawful. The evil effect upon the employee class would be far-reaching. It would apply not only to the laborer with his hands; it would apply to the clerk in the store; it might apply broadly in the United States courts to any kind of contract of employment.

I object to this clause, however, for a still further reason. It undertakes to declare that certain acts shall not be held or considered unlawful. The Senator from New Jersey seems to think that this applies to criminal acts. There are no criminal statutes of the United States that it would affect. If it applies to any criminal acts or criminal statutes, it must apply to State statutes; and it might be held that this was a declaration which was to affect legislation by the States with reference to such acts. It might be held to reach into the police responsibility of the States for the conduct of their internal affairs.

I would be utterly unwilling to vote for a bill with such a provision in it. The truth is, I do not think it ought to be here at all. I do not think any of it ought to be here. We have relieved these acts from restraining orders and from injunctions. I think that is just as far, really, as we ought to go. If the question arises whether we shall strike it out altogether, I shall vote to strike it out; and if it is not stricken out altogether, I shall vote for that character of amendment added to it which will take from it as much as possible of its force. I think we go just as far as we ought to go, and possibly a little further than we ought to go, when we say that the acts shall not be the subject of injunction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the arrangement of these paragraphs is wrong. I think the labor organizations ought to be given their distinctive status in section 7, as I have heretofore remarked; but is the Senator sure that if the last paragraph or clause of this section were stricken out the remaining part of it would be constitutional?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think we can take away from the courts all power of issuing injunctions without disturbing or changing the rights of individuals?

I will put it clearly. I do not know that the Senator understands me. Suppose that a certain act is a violation of the antitrust laws. Suppose the remedy for that act, according to the established procedure of the court, is an injunction. Does the Senator think we can take away the power of the court to issue an injunction and still permit the right to remain?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think we have left the right. I think section 7 covers that branch of the case, and really went as far as there was any necessity for going. I do not think either one of the things named here is illegal.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I agree with that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I think that amounts to a declaration that the courts shall not restrain them, because they are not illegal under the Sherman Antitrust Act. Therefore I am willing to let it pass with the provision that it is not a violation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. CUMMINS. Somewhere we must declare that they are not illegal; that it is not a violation of the law for a person or a combination of persons to do the things that are here recited. If that declaration be found in section 7, it would be entirely sufficient; but I doubt it very much. I think whatever declaration we make ought to be in section 7. I have been of the opinion, however, that unless we have in the statute somewhere a declaration that these acts do not constitute a violation of the law of the United States, we could not in all cases constitutionally deprive the courts of their ancient and established power of issuing an injunction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My own view is that section 7 takes these acts, when legally done, out from under the provisions of the antitrust laws and that further legislation upon the subject is unnecessary, and that an injunction could not be properly granted for that reason. Still, we may specify that it can not be done.

My main objection to this last clause, as it was written, was the objection that I stated. It goes far beyond merely preventing a United States court from restraining these acts, and I think it would have the result to which I have called attention. I prefer, certainly, to leave it simply that they shall not be considered or held to be violations of the antitrust laws. I do not think we ought to go to the extent of saying that they shall not be violations of any of the laws of the United States. I do not think we mean to apply it to anything except the antitrust laws.

What might be the effect upon contracts between employers and employees if we declared that a breach of a contract by an employer should not be a violation of any law of the United States? It is the law of the United States that a man shall comply with his contracts.

Mr. CUMMINS. What law of the United States requires that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not mean that there is a statutory law on the subject, but in all the courts of the United States contracts are enforced.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WALSH. But of course that contract rests upon the State law, does it not, and not upon any United States law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. State law or common law.

Mr. WALSH. It is the common law of the State. The Federal court enforces the common law of the State. There is no common law of the United States. The United States law rests upon statutes. So I feel that the Senator is unnecessarily alarmed. I thought he would be quite willing to accept the amendment now offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

I will say in this connection that I fully agree with the reasoning of the Senator concerning the use of the word "unlawful," but it seems to me that everything he desires is met by the amendment now suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why is it necessary to go further than to say "violations of the antitrust laws"? What is there beyond that that we wish to relieve him of?

Mr. WALSH. I have not the cases in mind myself, and I do not recall having seen them, but I am told that there are one or two other statutes that have occasionally been appealed to by Federal courts as justification for the issuance of injunctions in these labor disputes.

The Senator will remember when this case came up in the first place, in the New Orleans case, the injunction was issued upon two grounds. First, that it was issuable under the general principles of equity; and, second, that the acts were in contravention of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that an injunction would issue upon that ground. That contention was sustained, and the injunction was issued upon both grounds.

I am told that in the search that some judges have found some other statutes of the United States to which they have appealed in justification for the injunction. It occurs to me that we might very properly say that none of those Federal statutes shall be considered as making these acts unlawful. The general term is then excluded, and the contract is lawful or unlawful, as prescribed by the State law. The Federal court will enforce the common law of the State in which the contract is made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator said that one of the basic grounds for sustaining the injunction was the general principles of equity. Does the Senator mean that those were general principles of equity recognized in the State and growing out of the common law—the general principles of the common law?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And were enforced in equity?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly. They appeal to the general principles of equity. I may say that these injunctions have often been sought in the State courts and often issued by the State courts in cases in which no appeal was made whatever to the Federal antitrust statute. They were asked upon general principles of equity and granted upon general principles of equity, upon the principles of equity that have come down to us from the English chancery practice. That was so in the New Orleans case, when first it was held that the acts were justifiable for an injunction not only upon general principles of equity but upon the antitrust act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think, then, when we leave the language as it is, with the change suggested by the Senator from Texas, the United States courts could grant an injunction from these acts on general principles of equity?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. We have taken that power away from the court.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was that unless the legal right or the equitable right was removed by statute the courts could still enforce it, and that a denial of the right of a restraining order would be invalid.

Mr. WALSH. I do not feel called upon to enter into a discussion, because I am not prepared to admit the soundness of that view.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not prepared to admit it, although I realized that there was something in the suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to have the view of some of those who may have a more definite idea about it than I as to what we mean here when we say "unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application."

Mr. President, I know the reason for the insertion of that here. My opinion is that if it is construed as those construe it who want it in this bill it will be in violation of the Constitution. It is supposed that it prevents issuing an injunction covering not only material property but the right to employ people, or the right to discharge people, or the right to be employed, and all those things.

I do not know that there is any particular view that can be definitely advanced to clear the matter up, but I do want to say that this provision of section 18, of construed as those who insist on its going into the section would construe it, is in violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 19, page 28, line 5, after the word "or," strike out "at common law" and insert "under the laws of any State in which the act was committed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we now reach section 20, which presents a most interesting principle, the right of trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt, and inasmuch as it introduces a departure in the practice from that which has hitherto obtained, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I direct some observations to that subject.

The principle embodied in the provisions of the pending bill providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt, when the facts shown constitute a public offense, has been the subject of much heated debate in and out of Congress. It has been denounced as socialistic and anarchistic, terms commonly and quite indiscriminately employed in our day to characterize any effort to curb or control the vast power that accompanies great wealth and concentrated capital. It is insisted with an assurance that assumes that question or contradiction is equally impossible; that its purpose and its necessary effect are to weaken the courts and frustrate them in the performance of their functions. However imposing may be the sources from which emanate criticism of this character, I assert that it can easily be demonstrated that such a departure instead of weakening the administration of justice would extend the power and influence of the courts by assuring to them in greater measure the esteem of the people invited to cooperate in enforcing their decrees.

The power to punish as for contempt is said to be one "arbitrary in its nature." (Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal., 412.)

Recognizing the liability of judges who are only human, subject to human passions and human weaknesses, to abuse the power, there is scarcely a State in the Union that has not legislated to restrict and limit the exercise of it.

In this country the power of the courts to punish for contempt has always been looked upon with jealousy and a very strong disposition shown to restrict it. (Boyd v. Glucklich, 116 Fed., 131–136.)

Even in England this tendency has been exhibited. We are told by Chancellor Kent that "the power of the courts to punish summarily for contempt has lately been much restricted" there. (1 Kent's Commentaries, 330.)

Restrictive Federal legislation is not new. The arbitrary and tyrannical abuse of the power to punish as for contempt once led to the impeachment of a Federal judge—Judge Rice, of Missouri. He was acquitted, but the agitation to which the proceedings gave rise resulted in the passage by Congress of an act in the year 1831, by which Federal judges were deprived of the power to punish as for contempt newspaper comments on their proceedings, even though published during the course of a trial. (Cuyler v. Atlantic, 131 Fed., 95.)

The State courts generally hold that such publications may by their character become punishable as contempts, but the people of that day deemed it wise that any abuse of the right to print, as to the Federal courts, should be made triable and subject to punishment in some way other than summarily as a contempt of court. The act remains as the law even unto this day. It was signed by Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, who, perhaps, more prominently than any other figure in our history, stands for the maintenance of the power and authority of every department of the Federal Government.

The law has been made the subject of diatribes, not a few in number, by judges of the inferior Federal courts who have deplored their impotency in consequence of it in opinions, from which the uninformed might gain the impression that all liberty was about to be engulfed with our sacred institutions, its guardian, because of the innovation the statute makes. It has been in force, however, for over 80 years, but the Federal judiciary maintains a reasonable degree of vigor, and if our liberties have suffered any appreciable impairment the loss is not clearly traceable to the statute of 1831 as the cause thereof.

It is doubtful whether the law does or was intended to restrain or limit the power of the Supreme Court; but, with rare good judgment, that tribunal has never been moved to vindicate its honor or to assert its dignity by proceeding as for contempt against a journal or a journalist because of comments on its decisions. Some or all of the judges of that august court have been grossly libeled in connection with cases having a political aspect, notably the Dred Scott decision, the Legal Tender cases, and, more recently, the Standard Oil and American Tobacco Co. cases, in which the court was said to have read the word "reasonable" into the statute. To all intents and purposes the Supreme Court is restrained from the exercise of powers in connection with contempt cases, to deprive them of which some sensitive State courts have declared would render them contemptible.

Pennsylvania had an experience similar to that which gave rise to the Federal statute. Certain judges of that State were called to the bar for oppressive exercise of their arbitrary power as early as 1807, and a repetition of the offense guarded against by an act passed in 1809, defining what should constitute contempt and fixing the penalty which might be imposed.

And as legislation limiting the power to punish for contempt is not novel, neither is the method of trial by jury in cases of alleged contempt an innovation.

It is to be gathered from the discussions of this subject by more or less eminent jurists that such a procedure was unknown in English or American jurisprudence until unbridled radicalism gave countenance to it in the constitution of Oklahoma. The fact is that trial by jury in cases of contempt has long prevailed in the State of Kentucky, and that it is enjoined by the laws of Virginia, West Virginia, Georgia, Louisiana, and New Mexico. The Georgia statute was passed in conformity to a constitutional provision commanding the legislature to limit by law the power to punish for contempt. The constitution of Louisiana contains a similar provision. The constitution of Arizona, like that of Oklahoma, makes specific provision for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.

A statute of the State of Kentucky, in force for many years, denies to any judge of that State the power to impose a severer penalty for contempt than a fine of $30 or imprisonment for 30 days, except upon the verdict of a jury which fixes the punishment.

A most interesting case under this law is Arnold v. Commonwealth (80 Ky., 300). The accused assaulted one of the counsel in a case under the eyes of the court in the midst of the trial. The judge called in a jury, who heard the evidence, found the culprit guilty, and sentenced him to pay a fine of $1,000 and to serve a year in the penitentiary.

Who is there that doubts that the influence of this procedure was vastly more salutary than if the judge had himself inflicted such condign punishment upon the offender? The friends of the latter would unquestionably have attributed the action of the judge to some deep-seated malice he bore the subject of his judicial wrath, and would excuse the rashness of their favorite with suggesting that he was goaded by aspersions from his victim, countenanced or permitted from the bench. Thus a spirit of resentment would be aroused and the respect for and confidence in the court, which all ought to labor to promote, would be undermined. The verdict of an impartial jury, chosen from among the body of the citizens, could scarcely fail to silence any suggestion that justice had not been done.

But there is another merit in the Kentucky system even more pronounced. The jury being called into the box, the gravity of the offense is laid before them by the prosecuting officer. They are admonished with every art he can command to bear in mind how essential it is that the solemn orders and decrees of the courts, their courts, the tribunals they have established to administer justice and to protect life, liberty, and property, shall be obeyed, their proceedings be undisturbed by violence, and their dignity and the supremacy of the law maintained. It is only those who have no confidence in the ability or the disposition of the people to govern themselves who harbor any doubt that juries of this country, so appealed to, will be found prompt and eager to visit merited punishment on any contemnor.

Miscarriages of justice will sometimes occur. But so they will under any system, however contrived. The most perfect judicial systems ever known are those of which the jury forms an essential part.

But whatever criticism of trial by jury might be made from a purely judicial point of view, it must be acknowledged that as a political institution it is of inestimable value. It is the greatest school in self-government ever devised by the ingenuity of man.

At every session of court a body of citizens is called upon to aid in administering justice between contending litigants and to pass upon the guilt or innocence of those charged with transgressing the criminal law. They quit their duties very rarely without being impressed with a heightened sense of their obligations as citizens to uphold the law, to aid in the apprehension and punishment of transgressors, and to render justice to those with whom they deal. The eminent French philosopher, De Tocqueville, says:

> I think that the practical intelligence and political good sense of the Americans are mainly attributable to the long use which they have made of the jury in civil causes, and I look upon it as one of the most efficacious means for the education of the people which society can employ.

The State of Kentucky occupies, as indicated, by no means an isolated position in providing for trial by jury in cases of contempts. Its statute was borrowed from Virginia, where it originated, doubtless through the influence of Jefferson, who maintained all his life that cases in chancery should be tried before a jury, even as the law of my State commands that they be.

Are we to understand that the history of the State of Virginia gives any support to the belief expressed by a former President of the United States that trial by jury in cases of contempt "will greatly impair the indispensable power and authority of the courts"? It has been generally believed that if there is one State in the Union entitled to any distinction by reason of the superior reverence its people have for their courts it is the State that gave to us Marshall, Jefferson, Madison, and Henry.

Having remained the unquestioned law of the Old Dominion for nearly, if not quite, three-quarters of a century, the supreme court of that State, in that era when an unusual readiness was exhibited in nullifying legislative acts of a certain character for fancied conflict with constitutional principles, declared this law to be unconstitutional. It was held in Carter v. Commonwealth (96 Va., 791), a decision rendered in the year 1899, that the act in question trenched upon the inherent power of a constitutional court to punish for contempt, and that it was consequently void.

The people of that State had become so much attached, however, to the principle expressed in the law that when they wrote a new constitution in the year 1902 they expressly conferred upon the legislature of that State the power expressed in these words:

> The general assembly may regulate the exercise by courts of the right to punish for contempt. (Sec. 63, art. 4, constitution of Virginia, 1902.)

Justified by this provision of the constitution, a statute of that State provides that "No court shall, without a jury, for any such contempt as is mentioned in the first class embraced in section 3768, impose a fine exceeding $50 or imprisonment more than 10 days." The "first class" referred to comprises cases of "Misbehavior in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct or interrupt the administration of justice." I appeal to the distinguished Senators from the State of Virginia to tell this body whether the structure of republican government appears to be rocking upon its foundation in the State they so ably represent, whether the respect which its people ought to have for their courts is undermined, whether they are to any degree whatever embarrassed in their functions because of this statute, the incorporation of the principle of which in the Federal system has aroused so much apprehension in certain quarters?

The Senators from Kentucky might speak from intimate acquaintance with the actual working of the system in their State. The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], in the light of a long and distinguished career at the bar in his State, and the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], who had an honorable career as one of the judges of that State, might tell us how much of substance and how much of excited and ill-ordered fancy there is in the dread, expressed at times, that the system of trying issues of fact in contempt cases will paralyze the courts and bring them into disrespect.

In reason, why should any apprehension exist? An injunction has issued restraining one from taking ore from a mining claim. The judge calls in a jury, saying, in effect, to them: "The court heretofore issued an injunction in this case. The defendant is charged with having violated it. On your oaths I direct you to hear the evidence and to tell me whether he has or has not." If they say he has, he is punished; if they say he has not, he is dismissed. Is it unsafe to intrust the determination of that question to a jury? The rights of the parties in the first instance are intrusted to them. The title and right to the possession of a mining claim is submitted in the first instance to determination by a jury, so far as they depend upon questions in fact. If the jury awards the property to the plaintiff, he may have an injunction restraining the defendant from extracting the ore from it. But while centuries of experience have fully justified the belief that it is not only safe but wise to intrust to the arbitrament of a jury the facts upon which rest the basic rights of the parties, it is said to be unsafe to intrust to another jury the determination of the relatively unimportant question as to whether, as a matter of fact, after those rights are established by a decree, the defendant has violated them by disregarding the injunction contained in it.

An injunction issues only in an action in equity, except possibly by virtue of exceptional statutes. An action in equity is prosecuted ordinarily for the establishment and protection of property rights. The actions giving rise to the injunctions which precipitated the present discussion were prosecuted to protect property rights. If through an injunction crime is punished, that is incidental. No one undertakes to justify the procedure as a method of punishing crime. The decree in an injunction suit commands the defendant to restrain from doing certain things, being an interference with property rights of the complainant. The question is, "Did the defendant do so or not?" We submit to a jury to say whether a man committed murder or arson; we ask them to adjudicate upon life and liberty. We ask them to say, "Did the defendant fire the shot? Did he act in self-defense?" This is safe; this is a salutary method of resolving the fact. But it is neither safe nor wise to intrust to a jury to answer, "Did the defendant do the thing the injunction commanded him not to do?" And that question touches only a property right.

There is not an argument that can be advanced or thought of in opposition to trial by jury in contempt cases that is not equally an argument against the jury system as we now know it.

Test the plan by what may be considered likely to be its operation in connection with the very class of cases that give rise to the prominence it has attained in present-day thought. An injunction has issued in an industrial dispute. It is charged that it has been violated. If the judge himself assumes to determine whether it has been or has not been, he can scarcely hope to make a decision that will not subject him to the charge, if he finds the prisoner guilty, of subserviency to the capitalistic interests or hostility to organized labor, or if he shall acquit, to pusillanimity or the ambition of the demagogue. In either case his court suffers in the estimation of no inconsiderable body of citizens. How much wiser it would be to call in a jury to resolve the simple question of fact as to whether the defendant did or did not violate the injunction. What good reason is there for believing that a jury will be likely to disregard their oaths, turn a deaf ear to the plain admonitions of duty, and acquit a defendant flagrantly guilty? What cause have we for believing that they would be any more responsive to popular clamor than though they were trying an indictment or other criminal charge? My own firm conviction is that a jury of citizens, selected in the manner provided by law, from among the citizens of the State, representing them in the performance of an important public duty, would not prove recreant. Their verdict would silence cavilling and strengthen in the minds of the people the conviction that the courts are indeed the dispensers of justice and not engines of oppression. Instead of being an attack on the court, the proposal to submit to trial by jury alleged contempts not committed in the presence of the court, is a plan to restore to the Federal courts the confidence and good will which the people ought to bear toward them, but which, unfortunately, by a liberal and sometimes inconsiderate exercise of the power to issue injunctions and to punish as for contempt, has, among certain classes of citizens, been all but forfeited.

It may fairly be demanded that any discussion of the proposed change in the method of the trial of alleged contempts shall proceed upon the assumption that the jury system as it prevails generally with us, in England and her colonies, is an institution to be cherished "as essential," in the language of Judge Story, "to political and civil liberty"; that trial by jury in civil as well as in criminal cases is one of the inestimable privileges of a litigant in our courts.

Either the utter abandonment of the jury system must be asked or some reason must be advanced to establish that, though it is a reliable method for determining the facts upon which rest the primary rights of the party, it is a pernicious method of deciding a controverted fact as to the observance of a decree declaring those rights.

In opposition to the claim that the essential power of the court is weakened by calling a jury to aid in deciding matters of fact, I submit these reflections of the distinguished student of our institutions whose words were quoted above, the author of Democracy in America:

> The jury, then, which seems to restrict the rights of the judiciary, does in reality consolidate its power, and in no country are the judges so powerful as where the people share their privileges. It is especially by means of the jury in civil causes that the American magistrates imbue even the lower classes of society with the spirit of their profession. Thus the jury, which is the most energetic means of making the people rule, is also the most efficacious means of teaching it how to rule well.

This was not written in the heat of political controversy. It was not written to sustain or to combat any political view or theory. The words are the words of a calm and profound philosopher of another country, having no purpose but the purpose of the historian to lay bare to the study of the world the causes that contributed to the success of the experiment in self-government in this hemisphere.

It has been advanced that Congress is without power to make such provision for the trial of cases of indirect contempt as the present bill contemplates. But that question is set at rest, as all the commentators agree, by the decision of the Supreme Court in Ex parte Robinson (19 Wall., 505), a case in which the famous contempt statute of 1831 was considered.

The attack having been made upon the law as an invasion of the inherent power of the court, it was pointed out that the inferior Federal courts are not created by the Constitution, which simply authorizes Congress to ordain and establish them; Congress can give to them such jurisdiction within the limit fixed by the Constitution as it sees fit. It may give them the same unlimited power to punish for contempt as was enjoyed by a court of general jurisdiction at the common law or as would be implied in the establishment of such a court without express limitations in the organic law, or, as was decided in the Robinson case, it may invest them with a limited jurisdiction, and particularly it may limit and restrain them in respect to punishing for contempt of their authority.

If Congress may say that certain acts shall constitute contempt before such court, and certain other acts shall not; if it can declare that not to be a contempt which under well-settled rules is contempt at the common law, it is difficult to conceive upon what basis it can be claimed, much less maintained, that Congress may not say that certain acts shall not be punished summarily as contemptuous unless a jury shall find they were committed. It has been sometimes questioned whether in the case of statutory courts, at least those of inferior jurisdiction, the power to punish as for contempt exists unless specifically conferred. It is a novel doctrine that the legislature which creates the court may not prescribe the procedure which shall be followed in it.

The Court of Appeals of the State of New York regards the Robinson case as holding, in effect, that Congress has plenary power over the courts inferior to the Supreme Court in respect to punishment for contempt. The commentators take the same view. (See notes to Hale v. State, 36 L. R. A., 254–258; notes to C. B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 16 Am. and Eng. Cases, Ann., 749, 759.)

Whether it is within the power of the legislature to limit the authority of a court established by the Constitution as distinguished from one which owes its existence to a statute, though created under a constitutional provision, authorizing the establishment of inferior courts, it is unnecessary in this connection to inquire. Emphasis was placed in the Carter case referred to on the fact that the court whose judgment came under review was created by and derived its jurisdiction from the Constitution. The Supreme Court of Georgia, in commenting on it in Bradley v. State (50 L. R. A., 611), adverted to that feature as justifying the decision, and pointed out the essential difference between the two classes of courts, instancing the Federal tribunal as among those which, because of their statutory origin, are subject to the plenary authority of the legislature.

It is noticeable, however, that there is a strong trend of judicial opinion in favor of the view that even in the case of constitutional courts the legislature has the power to limit the authority to punish for contempt, at least to prescribe the penalty and regulate the procedure. Some recent decisions in the State of Missouri will illustrate this tendency. In the case of State ex relatione Crow v. Shepherd (177 Mo., 205), decided in 1903, a law of that State, in substance much like the Federal act of 1831, was held by a unanimous court to be unconstitutional as an invasion of the judicial power vested in the court by the constitution, the argument being that the power to punish for contempt is inherent in the court and not subject to the regulatory authority of the lawmaking branch of the government.

This decision was affirmed in the case of Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway Co. v. Gildersleeve (219 Mo., 170), decided in 1909, but by a divided court, Justice Lamme filing a vigorous dissenting opinion. In 1912, in the case of Ex parte Creasy (243 Mo., 679), these cases were overruled; and in State v. Reynolds (158 S. W., 671–681), decided in 1913, Brown, judge, touching the Shepherd case, said that—

> The doctrines announced in that case have since been repudiated and now have very few defenders either among courts, lawyers, or laymen.

The doctrines referred to are those flowing from the claim of inherent power, upon which the Virginia court decided the Carter case. It is an interesting circumstance that Shepherd was made the victim of the judicial wrath because, as in the case that led to the impeachment of Judge Peck, he had, through the columns of his paper, criticized with some severity the supreme court of that State. The subject of his comment was a case brought by dependent relatives against a railroad company to recover damages on account of the death of an employee. On its third appearance before the supreme court the right to recover was denied by a bare majority of the judges. It is significant that under the doctrine now firmly established in the State of Missouri, the Federal act of 1831 is justifiable, aside from the consideration to which the supreme court referred in upholding the statute. Even constitutional courts are subject to regulation under the law as it is now administered in Missouri, in the exercise of the power to punish as for contempt, to the extent to which Congress went in the enactment of that law.

The Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of West Virginia held that the power to regulate the punishment for contempt, so completely vindicated by the Missouri court, extends so far as to justify a statute which required resort to the ordinary criminal procedure for the punishment of certain classes of contempt cases.

The law having provided, as in the case of the parent State of Virginia, that no court should, without a jury, in certain cases of contempt impose a fine exceeding $50, or imprisonment for more than 10 days, continued:

SEC. 30. If any person by threats or force attempt to intimidate or impede a judge, justice, juror, witness, or an officer of a court, in the discharge of his duty, or to obstruct or impede the administration of justice in any court, he shall be prosecuted as for a misdemeanor and punished by fine and imprisonment, or either, at the discretion of a jury.

In the case of State v. Frew & Hart (24 W. Va., 416) it was held that this statute did not apply to the appellate court, but was to be restrained in its operation to contempts of the inferior courts. As to them the court said:

They have the right at any time to call before them both grand and petit juries, and under the statute they may, with but little delay—almost as summarily as before the statute—punish such contempts. The statute as to such courts may well be regarded as a regulation, and, perhaps, a necessary and proper limitation. (Diskin's case, 4 Leigh, 685; ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall., 505.)

In the later case of State v. McClaugherty (33 W. Va., 250) the question presented will be gathered from the following, from the opinion:

I think the offense charged in the rule is plainly one within the provisions of the thirtieth section of the statute—quoted above—and therefore punishable only as a misdemeanor by indictment. (Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall., 505.)

The opinion by Snyder, president, continues:

The statute is, it seems to me, simply a regulation of the proceedings and not a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the courts in contempt cases.

And then referring to the reasoning of State against Frew & Hart, the contempt feature is disposed of in this language:

For these reasons and upon the authorities cited we hold the said statute constitutional and valid as a regulation of the manner by which contempt shall be punished in the circuit courts of this State. From this conclusion it follows that the circuit court had no power to issue the rule for the alleged contempt of the defendant in this case.

The Senate of the United States gave its sanction as long ago as the year 1896 to a bill expressive of the principle of trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt. It was in the charge, during its consideration by this body, of the eminent lawyer, David B. Hill, then Senator from the State of New York. This body numbered among its Members at the time some of the most profound jurists that ever came to it, including among others Bacon, Hoar, George, Gray, and Morgan. It is not difficult at all for anyone conversant with import of parliamentary procedure to understand the significance of various attempts, sometimes successful, again ineffective, through the insistence of Mr. Hill to displace the bill when it finally came before the Senate. But only one voice was raised in opposition, and it eventually passed without the formality of a roll call. Fortunately the RECORD preserves for us the views, as they were there expressed, of the late Senator Bacon, of Georgia, whose recent death removed from among us one who was loved by his colleagues no less for his nobility of character than he was admired for his brilliant talent and mature judgment. I conclude with the following from his remarks in the course of the debate on the Hill bill. He said:

I have been impressed with the importance of such a measure for many years in the course of a not inactive practice of the law. I think the lodgment of the power in any one man to determine whether personal liberty shall be taken is something entirely inconsistent with the genius of this age and with the spirit of our institutions. Every other branch of government has been shorn of the power of despotism—the legislative and the executive—but it is a fact that the judicial authority has the same power for despotism and personal tyranny to-day in all practical effect that it had 300 years ago; and it is time that this legislation should be had.

My experience is not like that of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt]. I have seen instances of judicial tyranny where time has not brought me to the conclusion that the power was wisely exercised. On the contrary, the lapse of time has but deepened the conviction which I had that those exercises of power could be denominated as nothing else than personal tyranny.

Mr. President, it is not simply the fact that one man is clothed with this power, which no man ought to have; it is not simply the fact that there never was a man good enough and wise enough to be endowed with the power that judges now have in this regard; but it is the fact that they are frequently called upon to decide these questions when they have personal feelings in the matter. Frequently there is such feeling between the judge and the man whom he punishes; and yet he is judge and jury and prosecutor in the case in which he has this personal feeling.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not rise to confute the able argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as to the right of trial by jury in contempt cases. He has perhaps stated it as clearly and as ably as the cause is capable of being stated; but every argument which the Senator has made in favor of the right of trial by jury upon the part of one citizen of the United States is equally applicable to the right of trial by jury upon the part of every other citizen of the United States. I am wondering whether, after this clear and logical statement appealing to the sense of justice of the American people and their conception of right, if we will apply the principle to one class of people only, and affirmatively deny it to another class of people. I am perfectly aware that no particular class is mentioned, but in the practical operation of the laws we are about to pass the result will be that one class will be tried by one rule and another class by another rule.

I am perfectly willing to go as far as the wisdom of the particular time will suggest in extending rights or in providing measures which would seem to prevent any act of so-called tyranny upon the part of our courts; but I am not willing to single out a class of people and extend to them a fundamental right, and deny to another very large class of people the same right. It offends every sense of justice of which I have any conception, and it offends against every principle of free institutions and equal rights. The laboring man is anxious for a trial by jury in contempt cases, but you can not convince me that he wants to deprive his neighbor or his fellow countrymen of this right.

Mr. President, a few days ago we passed what is known as a trade commission bill, which, I presume, is soon to become a law. Under that bill and under that law, if it becomes a law, we have provided for practically the control of the business of this country through injunctions; we have put the business men of the country under the surveillance of the courts through the injunctive process; and if they violate the law they are not given a right of trial by jury, but must be tried by the court and punished by the court. These suits will be suits by the Government, and are excepted from the operation of the law under section 22 of this bill.

Upon what possible theory do we single out the business men of the country, unless we assume in the beginning that they are all criminals and so dishonest and unworthy as to be placed in an ostracized class and denied even the fundamental rights which we are prepared to grant to others? Upon what theory do we single them out, put them under the surveillance of the injunctive process of the court, and affirmatively deny them the right of a hearing by a jury? Is the business man of this country who employs the laborer any different in his position under the laws of the United States than the laborer who is employed by him? Is one class of citizens to be placed in one category and another class in another? Will the Congress of the United States adjourn with such an inconsistent and incongruous contradiction as that in the law? Will we deny to any man the right of trial by jury where punishment is to follow judgment if we do not deny it to all?

Let me call your attention to what the author of the trade-commission bill said about trial by jury when it relates to business men. He said:

Then there is the power to punish by contempt for disobedience to the mandate of the law, which is much more effective than the criminal prosecution of individuals, bringing them before grand juries and petit juries and submitting all these questions to the varying influences, passions, and prejudices of the hour. I believe that in this way a complete system of administrative law can be built up much more securely than by the eccentric action of grand juries and trial juries. I believe that it is not always necessary to administer the law with the aid of grand and trial juries. The vast body of our law is civil law. The parties have their remedy either in damages or by the summary processes of a court of equity, which can seize hold of a recalcitrant and bring him into subjection to the law, and the administrative tribunal will aid and accelerate the administration of the civil law.

When you are dealing with the vast body of men who give employment to labor, upon whose prosperity depends the prosperity of labor—when you are dealing with him juries are "eccentric" and passion-moved bodies, impractical and worthless. When you deal with those who have a different kind of a suit brought, juries are the "palladium" of American liberty, one of the pillars of free government.

Mr. President, if the trade commission should come to the conclusion that a certain practice was unfair competition, and should go into court to have it enforced against the objection of the man against whom the order was issued, and if, perchance, that business man should violate the injunction, in the complex and multiplied affairs of the business world, if his conception of obeying the order should be slightly different from that of the court, he would be called before the court and given a trial by the court. I am not speaking now of instances where the act also constitutes a crime; but as I understand the bill, even if the act be also a crime, yet if it is in a Government suit no trial by jury can be had.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand the bill now under consideration, as found in section 22, if the injunction which is claimed to have been violated was issued in a suit brought by the United States, the provision for trial by jury does not apply. Therefore, in any suit brought by the Government to enforce the antitrust laws the trial by jury is not provided. In a suit brought to enforce the unfair-competition section of the trade commission bill the Government is the complainant, and this statute would not apply to it; but the offenders against injunctions under the unfair-competition clause of the trade commission bill and the offenders against the antitrust laws, in so far as they are prosecuted by the Government, stand upon exactly the same footing.

Mr. BORAH. There is no doubt at all about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I fail, therefore, to see the discrimination which the Senator from Idaho has so well pointed out.

Mr. BORAH. I think I will convince the Senator that the discrimination exists, although not along the line specified by the Senator. Of course, so far as defendants in a Government case are concerned, all are on the same basis; but under the trade commission all suits will be by the Government and all actions will be against business men. So your discrimination is not as to one class of defendants as against another class of defendants in a Government suit, but the discrimination is as to those who violate injunctions issued at the request of private employers and the Government. The Government is the only party who will bring injunctions under the trade commission, and business men are the only people to whom that law—not in terms, but in its practical workings—will apply. The Government brings a suit, and the trial in contempt cases is by the court. A private party brings a suit, and the trial for contempt cases is by the jury.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. I invite the attention of the Senator to section 19 of the bill, and ask him whether that does not apply to all cases, whether labor cases or not?

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that in a few minutes. I am going to review section 22, section 19, and these other sections connectedly. Does the Senator from Texas mean to say that the right of trial by jury extends to every citizen who violates an injunction which has been issued by a Federal court, whether at the instance of the Government or private parties?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is my construction of section 19.

Mr. BORAH. You will have to strike out section 22, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. The violation must constitute a crime against either the United States or one of the States in order to give trial by jury.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that. Mr. President, my understanding of sections 19, 20, and 22, when construed together and taken in connection with the trade commission bill, makes a clear line of demarcation between a certain class of citizens of the United States and another class of citizens with reference to the right of trial by jury, not, I grant you, by the express language of the statutes, but because of the fact that the trade-commission statute will be enforced by the Government. If the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. CULBERSON] understand that in Government cases as well as in all other cases where injunctions are issued the parties shall be entitled to a trial by jury, the same as in cases between private employers and employees, then I would be inclined to think I was in error. I do not think I am in error, however. I do not believe they will contend for any such thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to have that understood now. I supposed it was agreed. There can not be any difference between us, I am sure, as to the interpretation of section 22. Government cases are not within the section which gives the right of trial by jury.

Mr. BORAH. And all cases under the trade commission bill would be Government cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. All cases under the trade commission bill brought by the commission would be Government cases.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. And all cases brought under the antitrust laws by the Department of Justice would be Government cases.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator agrees with me that all cases brought by the Government to enforce the trade commission bill and all cases brought by the Government to enforce the Sherman antitrust law are cases in which the right of trial by jury is denied as to contempt cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understand it, and I was about to rise, when the Senator from Idaho rose, to ask why Government cases were excepted. I see no reason in the world why a case brought by the Government in which an injunction is issued the violation of which is a crime against some law should not be governed by the same law by which an ordinary injunction is governed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if you give the right of trial by jury in your trade-commission case against the business men of this country, if the Congress of the United States is prepared to give those men a right of trial by jury, there will be a reconsideration of the trade-commission bill before it becomes a law, in my judgment. Yet, Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Montana, which I repeat was so ably and clearly presented, must inevitably apply, if it applies at all, to every man who comes under the inhibition of an injunction. I do not see how you can, under any theory of justice, deny to a man a jury trial because of the business he happens to be engaged in.

What is the situation? Suppose we bring a suit under the trade commission bill against the fruit raisers and fruit marketers of my State, who may be engaged in competition with the fruit raisers just across the river in Oregon, or in the State of Washington. These fruit raisers are all men engaged, as a matter of fact, in actual labor. They are small farmers. Suppose an order is issued against them, and they do not comply with the order, and the Government brings an action to enjoin them. Suppose we see the Federal court of the United States performing the high function of an executive clerk for a trade commission, and they issue an injunction, and those 50 or 100 men in the Payette Valley in the State of Idaho violate the injunction, and they are brought before the court for trial. What kind of a hearing do they get? Why, they get a hearing before the court. If, perchance, every employee that they had, or that any of them had, were brought into a court under an injunction between employer and employee, the employer would be tried in the same court by the court, and the employee in the same court by a jury.

It is not the fact that we extend these rules that I complain of, because I think there is much to be said in support of the argument of the Senator that it will increase confidence in the courts in the minds of the people of this country; but it is the fact that we are unwilling to extend it to all our people.

"Government by injunction" originated in the Debs case. After the Debs case the cry of "Government by injunction" became quite general in this country among a great class of people, and was condemned very generally. Let us look at that case for a moment:

> On July 2, 1894, the United States, by Thomas E. Milchrist, district attorney for the northern district of Illinois, under the direction of Richard Olney, Attorney General, filed their bill of complaint in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois against these petitioners and others.
> The bill further averred that four of the defendants, naming them, were officers of an association known as the American Railway Union; that in the month of May, 1894, there arose a difference or dispute between the Pullman Palace Car Co. and its employees, as the result of which a considerable portion of the latter left the service of the car company.

Then it sets forth the things they were charged with having done, and further says:

> On presentation of it to the court an injunction was ordered commanding the defendants "and all persons combining and conspiring with them, and all other persons whomsoever, absolutely to desist and refrain from in any way or manner interfering with, hindering, obstructing, or stopping any of the business of any of the following-named railroads" (specifically naming the various roads named in the bill) "as common carriers of passengers and freight between or among any States of the United States, and from in any way or manner interfering with, hindering, obstructing, or stopping any mail trains, express trains, or other trains, whether freight or passenger, engaged in interstate commerce or carrying passengers or freight between or among the States; and from in any manner interfering with, hindering, or stopping any trains carrying the mail; and from in any manner interfering with, hindering, obstructing, or stopping any engines, cars, or rolling stock of any of said companies engaged in interstate commerce or in connection with the carriage of passengers or freight between or among the States.
> This injunction was served upon the defendants—at least upon those who are here as petitioners. On July 17 the district attorney filed in the office of the clerk of said court an information for an attachment against the four defendants, officers of the railway union, and on August 1 a similar information against the other petitioners. A hearing was had before the circuit court, and on December 14 these petitioners were found guilty of contempt.

Mr. President, that was the original case which really gave rise to the earnest discussion in this country of what we call government by injunction. It was a case in which the Government itself went all over the United States and restrained a vast body of employees from doing certain things, and when they refused to obey the injunction brought them into court and punished with contempt upon trial by the court alone.

Mr. Justice Brewer says:

The case presented by the bill is this: The United States, finding that the interstate transportation of persons and property, as well as the carriage of the mails, is forcibly obstructed, and that a combination and conspiracy exists to subject the control of such transportation to the will of the conspirators, applied to one of their courts, sitting as a court of equity, for an injunction to restrain such obstruction and prevent carrying into effect such conspiracy.

Again, on page 594 of the opinion, the court says:

If any criminal prosecution be brought against them for the criminal offenses alleged in the bill of complaint, of derailing and wrecking engines and trains, assaulting and disabling employees of the railroad companies, it will be no defense to such prosecution that they disobeyed the orders of injunction served upon them and have been punished for such disobedience.

Now, the principles and procedure of the Debs case, which gave rise to this demand for a jury trial in contempt cases, are left untouched and wholly intact. The right of the court in all such cases to try the party charged with contempt is carefully protected. In fact, all that class of cases which gave birth to this demand for jury trial are wholly excepted from the operation of this law. So we have, when the trade commission bill and this bill are in their practical workings taken together, a discrimination as to citizens engaged in different occupations; but we have also a discrimination based on the mere question of who is the plaintiff as to labor itself.

This bill provides—

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.

Under the decision of the courts I do not know how far a thing would have to be away in order not to obstruct the administration of justice, because under the decisions anything that interferes with the decree or the carrying out of the decree interferes with the administration of justice. But we pass that over for the present time.

Nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, but the same, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act, may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

Mr. President, how does any man defend that discrimination? It is not only a discrimination between the business man and the employee, but take another illustration. Suppose any large employer of men brings a suit in equity and enjoins his men from doing certain things, and they violate it. Suppose at the same time the Government conceives the act of those employees to be interfering with interstate commerce, and the Government brings an action at the same time to enjoin them from interfering with interstate commerce. They violate the injunction which their employer had issued and they violate the injunction which the Government had issued. The laboring man comes into court under one injunction and he is tried by the court. He sits there until the next case is called, and he is tried by a jury. Will it be any particular consolation to this laboring man to know that a jury has acquitted him if the court has convicted him?

It is, in my judgment, an incongruous and indefensible position for us to take because it does not even protect the men whom it is designed to protect.

Now let us look at section 19, Mr. President:

SEC. 19. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

That is in case his act chances to be a criminal act also, but it does not necessarily follow that it will be a criminal act. These things were general restraints for which the parties were punished in the Debs case. The multitude of their acts were not criminal acts. They were simply distinct violations of the order of the court not to interfere with the running of the train. The vast multitude of things which are restrained in these instances would not necessarily be a criminal act. So the instances in which parties would be restrained under the trade commission act very often would simply be a violation of the order of the court relating to the ordinary business affairs of life, to the things which the business world conceive to be legal and proper.

Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate not to let these two bills go out with this clear, distinct, manifest classification of our citizens into two different classes of people so far as their rights in the case are concerned. If the right of trial by jury in contempt cases is calculated to educate the people, is a great public school in which they can get a clearer and a broader conception of the duties of citizenship, if the right of trial by jury is essential in one instance to see that judicial tyranny does not oppress the citizen, tell me upon what constitutional argument or basis of reasoning we can deny to another man simply because he has engaged in a different line of business?

I shall move, in order to test the sense of the Senate, when the time comes, to strike out section 22 with the exception of one clause in it, and see whether or not we are willing to apply this rule to all alike, to the business man and to the laboring man or whoever he may be.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Idaho to make the point that section 19 applies only in labor cases. Let me read that section:

SEC. 19. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

That recognizes no distinction as to classes or as to cases, but it is confined and limited to cases only where the act of any man, whether he be an employee or an employer, shall also be an offense against some statute of the United States or some law of a State in which the act was committed. It applies to all classes of persons, the limitation being as to the act which is enjoined by the writ or process. If that be, as I have said, a criminal offense under the laws of the United States or of the State in which the act was committed, trial by jury is authorized and provided for, but in all cases, whether by employer or employee, or whether that relationship exists or not, the other method of trial for contempt is provided for in section 22. Now let us turn to section 22 and see if that construction is not the proper one:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, but the same, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act, may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

So, Mr. President, there is no distinction in section 22 between employers and employees or any other class of citizens. The exception is only where the contempt is in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, or where the United States are a party.

I submit to the Senator from Idaho that upon reflection he will agree with me that the distinction as to classes is not made by these two sections as he has indicated in his remarks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is no difference of opinion between the Senator from Texas and myself. I agree that no classes are mentioned in the statutes; but the Senator will concede that the cases under the trade commission will be cases by the Government and will operate almost entirely against business men, and that as to those cases no jury can be had.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that section 19 does not provide for trial by jury except where the act is a criminal offense against any statute of the United States or the laws of any State in which the act is committed. It is only in those cases that trial by jury is provided for in section 19.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but now, Mr. President:

SEC. 19. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

Suppose, Mr. President, that you had a suit under the trade-commission act, and the things which the people did in violation of the injunction were not criminal acts, how would they be tried?

Mr. CULBERSON. They would be tried under section 22.

Mr. BORAH. We will see what section 22 says:

SEC. 22. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States.

In all suits brought under the trade-commission act by the United States the parties in all suits would be subject to trial as they are. I think that is clear.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. In just a minute. Then you have the effect of this act confined practically to an injunction suit between employer and employee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the real effect of the sections under consideration is simply to exempt from the present law such contempts as involve an offense under the laws of the United States or of any State, except when the United States is a party, and that the law otherwise remains in full force and effect.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose an employer brings an injunction suit and has an injunction issued against his employees, and suppose that they violate that injunction, and he brings them into court to be punished for contempt, if those employees in violating the injunction have not committed a crime, are they triable by the court, without a jury?

Mr. SHIELDS. No, sir; I understand not.

Mr. BORAH. They are tried by a jury.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand whether it is an employer or an employee that commits the contempt, if the act is also a violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of a State a jury trial is allowed. In other words, there is not a classification of persons, but simply an exemption or exception in certain cases from the present procedure.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but the exception of those certain cases are Government cases, and practically all the cases under the trade commission act and all under the Sherman Antitrust Act will be Government cases. So it operates to confine itself to employer or employee, or cases of a private nature.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to make one further suggestion concerning cases under the trade commission bill. Nearly every State in the Union has statutes condemning restraints of commerce which are much more drastic, which go much more into detail, than the Sherman Act. Perhaps every act which has been stated here to be unfair competition under the Federal trade commission act is made a criminal offense under the State statutes. The Senator's attention has been directed to those statutes, and to the drastic character of them?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; my attention has been directed to them, and my sympathy has been somewhat excited in behalf of the business men who undertake to conform both to the order and the State statute.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, all who commit a contempt which involves an offense under the State laws, when proceeded against under the Federal trade commission on account of being guilty of unfair competition, will be entitled to a jury trial?

Mr. BORAH. What I want to get the view of the Senator upon is this proposition, because we may have extended the provision too far: Suppose that a private employer brings an injunction suit and enjoins his employees from doing certain things which they are doing, which are not crimes, and they are brought into court. Are they not tried by a jury or are they tried by the court?

Mr. SHIELDS. If the contempt also constitutes a criminal offense under a Federal statute or State law?

Mr. BORAH. But I leave that out. I say the things which they do are not offenses against the laws of the State or the United States, but simply offenses against the injunction. They are entitled to a jury trial, nevertheless, are they not?

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand not. I understand the present law applies only to cases where a criminal offense has been committed.

Mr. BORAH. I think, Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. But I do not think the Senator fully caught my reference to State laws.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think that the fact that those guilty of violating injunctions granted in cases brought by the trade commission to restrain unfair competition will, by the delays and uncertainties that attend jury trials, greatly weaken the efficiency of the commission. I favor the provisions of this bill concerning contempt proceedings, and will vote for them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after all refinements are put aside, this plain, notorious fact seems to me to remain, that we have provided here in the trade commission bill for a vast number of suits upon the part of the Government for the purpose of restraining the business world from doing certain things which the trade commission will conceive to be unfair competition. Those men are to be tried by a court and not by a jury.

I understand, if a private employer brings an action against an employee, and he comes into court, he is entitled to a trial by a jury, provided his act amounts to a crime.

Mr. CHILTON. Why does the Senator continue to say employee? There is no employee or employer mentioned in the section at all.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. CHILTON. It simply applies to anyone who commits a crime which is also a violation of an injunction. He is tried by a jury under those conditions——

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose you bring an action under the trade commission act against 40 merchants, an injunction is issued against them, and they violate it, but the thing which they have done does not amount to a crime.

Mr. CHILTON. That does not enter into it. It does not make any difference whether it is a crime or not. They are tried under the law as it is now and under section 22.

Mr. BORAH. Those business men are given a trial before the court.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; and if a laboring man he would have under those circumstances a trial before a court, and any one of those men or anyone else would have a trial before the court. There is no distinction in these statutes now.

Mr. BORAH. But does the Senator contemplate that there will be very many suits brought to enjoin laboring men from unfair competition?

Mr. CHILTON. I never thought about it except as we considered it under section 7 of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Do the laboring men of the country understand that this trade commission bill includes jurisdiction to determine whether or not they are unfairly competed against with regard to wages?

Mr. CHILTON. I think we have expressed ourselves in section 7 of that act, whatever it means. There was not a Senator here who voted against it nor did any Member of the other House. We settled that question without a dissenting voice.

Mr. BORAH. We did not settle it. Here is the trade-commission bill which determines the question of unfair competition. It is well known that it is to deal with the business world. There is no contemplation that it is to deal with questions of wages, labor, and so forth. I doubt if it could be made to deal with those questions, because it would not be sufficiently within the power of Congress as to interstate commerce; but you are dealing there with the great business world, and every man who violates an injunction in those instances which you and I have agreed upon is tried by the court.

Mr. CHILTON. Every citizen. I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing in section 22. It was a very difficult and complicated situation that we had to deal with. The Senator must recall that there are many injunctions which are commands really. For instance, take a case where the court directs that a thing shall be done, and it puts a man in jail or prescribes a penalty until he does do that very thing. You can not deal with those things by juries. We do not want to weaken the arm of the Federal courts needlessly; nobody wants to do it, except in certain things where we thought it would possibly be best.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says "except in certain things." If this fundamental right is not applied to every citizen alike——

Mr. CHILTON. We did not want to do it in so far as we thought it weakens the power of the court in those cases where there was no need of doing it. For instance——

Mr. BORAH. The argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] upon this question was that it does not weaken but strengthens the courts and their administration of justice.

Mr. CHILTON. I call the attention of the Senator to this proposition: There is a violation in the presence of the court. It does not require any jury to ascertain the facts. A man goes near the court and starts a row; you may say he starts a riot right on the outside of the door of the court room.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose he does not start a riot and the court thinks he does?

Mr. CHILTON. That, of course, would be an unfortunate situation, but——

Mr. BORAH. A jury ought to pass on that.

Mr. CHILTON. Suppose the court had commanded one to make a deed. There it is entered on the court records. He is holding property and he will not turn it over. The court commands him to make a deed. He refuses to do it. There is nothing to try there. It would be a farce to empanel a jury to try a case of that kind, because there the record shows that he was commanded to do it after the court had heard the evidence, and he had declined, and the court ought to put him in jail or issue some other kind of process upon him until he does comply with the order of the court. All those cases were taken into consideration. We thought we had met the condition as nearly as we could.

But the Senator from Idaho is mistaken in his construction of section 22. It does not make any difference, in my opinion, whether it is a violation of law or not. In cases brought by the United States all persons everywhere are tried the same way; that is, by the court.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that; but why is it that a man who violates an injunction issued by the United States is in any different position from a man who violates an injunction issued by a private individual?

Mr. CHILTON. There are no injunctions issued by a private individual or by the United States. All must issue from a court.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator understands what I mean; I mean at the instance of the Government of the United States or at the instance of private individuals.

Mr. CHILTON. The distinction is not always clear in every case, but we thought the power of the United States should not be weakened in these trust cases. We wanted teeth in these laws. The Government brings a suit, and we intended to make it effective. There would possibly be so many cases that you could not have trials by juries if the Government should be resisted. We thought possibly people might seek to prolong these trials, and the Government would never get at the end of them.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator see that he is imposing upon private individuals a task and burden and expense which he is not willing to impose upon the great Government of the United States, with its unlimited resources?

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator is talking about these laws having teeth in them. We tried to put that much teeth in them, and we thought it best. All laws so far regarding this thing are, in the opinion of some, arbitrary. You can not in laws cover all circumstances and conditions. A rule is bound in practice to develop exceptions that ought to be made.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will agree with me that in all such cases as the Debs case, which gave rise to the doctrine of government by injunction, the parties are still entitled to a trial by the court alone and not by a jury.

Mr. CHILTON. I think the principle in the main is correct. I believe in it; that is, where there is a fact not in the knowledge of the court, not clearly ascertainable from the records; and where there is an isolated fact and the ascertainment of that fact would make a man a criminal under the laws of the State or of the United States, I think he ought to be tried by a jury in every case everywhere.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator would vote with me to strike out that portion of section 22.

Mr. CHILTON. No; I am going to vote with the committee.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the last statement of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] in connection with the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] discloses the evil of the entire provision relative to trial of any class of contempt cases by jury, and I deplore the fact, Mr. President, that this provision is contained in the bill. Why not, if it is right at all, extend the provisions of trial by jury to cases wherein the Government is a party or where the action is brought on behalf of the Government?

Why has the court the power to punish for contempt? Why is it necessary that it have such power? To preserve and maintain the authority of the court, as I take it; to compel, if need be, respect for that authority. It seems to me that if the authority of and the respect for the court in a case where the Government is a party is best subserved without the trial by jury that authority and that respect will be best subserved in the same way in any other case—a case, for example, between individuals where the Government is not a party at all. This is the foundation of the right to punish for contempt—the maintenance of the authority of the court. While I can not on the spur of the moment, Mr. President, answer in detail the able argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] just made, yet some greater reason must be furnished than has yet been stated in order that I may be brought to support a provision which does away with the principles and the practices of more than a century.

Mr. President, I think the tendency is to go to an extreme in this proposed legislation. We infer too much from the isolated case, the very rare case, in modern days, when, perhaps, some judge has abused his authority or has imposed an excessive punishment for contempt of the court. It is hard to recall now any case where within recent years there has been any abuse of the power of the court alone to punish for contempt.

There are various considerations that can be urged against the enactment of a law of this kind, against the change of this ancient practice whereby the courts have maintained their authority. One is the delay of a trial by jury. I think it must be conceded that contempt of court should in the very nature of things and for the purpose of maintaining the authority of the court be visited with summary and speedy punishment. There will be the delay in procuring a jury incident to the trial of criminal cases. It is to be remembered, too, that indirect contempts, for the most part, will arise not in the law court where a jury may be more readily found, or where there is a jury in attendance upon the court, but they will arise, and are expected to arise, in equity cases where there is no jury and where there is no means of procuring a jury for the trial of causes. Such will be the class of cases for the most part in which alleged contempts will arise.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCLEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from South Dakota is clearly mistaken, because this provision refers to Federal courts, and all the Federal district courts have juries.

Mr. STERLING. They have juries for the trial of causes at law, but they do not have juries for the trial of cases in equity unless it be in rare instances where a jury may be called to try an issue of fact in an equity case, its decision or verdict then being simply advisory to the court.

There is another thing about this, Mr. President, which makes the bill objectionable to my mind. For what kind of contempts is there a trial by jury? Those involving the commission of a crime, and those alone. Here would be an illustration, for example, of the exercise of this power: A man subpœnaed as a witness or summoned as a juror in a cause negligently, or inadvertently it may be, disobeys the summons of the court or fails or, perchance, refuses to appear, but the negligence or the refusal to obey is accompanied by no crime, nor is any act of violence whatever committed; it is simply an inadvertence or negligence, or, as I say, no more than a refusal to obey the subpœna or summons. On the other hand, the officer with a subpœna in his hand or a summons in his hand is assaulted, and the service of the process of the court is prevented by that assault. A crime has been committed. That man, under this bill, has the benefit of a jury trial, while the man who has committed the contempt through inadvertence or negligence, or without any violence at all, without any crime, is denied the right of a trial by jury. He can be convicted of contempt of court, under the procedure, on a mere preponderance of evidence, whereas the man who has committed the crime in contempt of court has the benefit of the rule that he can not be convicted unless the jury believes, beyond all reasonable doubt, that he is guilty of the contempt. This is the distinction which the bill makes between the man charged with a crime and the man charged with a mere inadvertence, perhaps, or mere negligence in obeying the order of the court; and it is a distinction in favor of the party who has committed the more serious offense.

Mr. President, this is not all in regard to this provision. I claim, further, that the provision of this bill for the trial by jury of cases of contempt, or of a class of cases of contempt, is unconstitutional and an invasion of the judicial power conferred by the Constitution upon the courts. It has been so held in some of the States cited by the Senator from Montana this morning. I briefly want to call attention to what the court has said with reference to this power. I read this extract from an opinion of Chief Justice Ryan, of Wisconsin. I read Bailey on Habeas Corpus, at page 220. The opinion was rendered in the case of In re Pierce (44 Wis., 448):

> The constitution of this State in creating this court and the circuit courts as courts of record vested in them ex vi termini this common-law power to punish for contempt, as an absolute and essential quality of superior courts, as much as the power to sit in judicial order with open doors, in public session.
> I do not question but that this power may be regulated by statute. But no statute could be effectual to take it away; no statutory regulation can be effectual so to abridge, impair, or cripple it, as to leave the courts without effectual power, effectually to punish, as for contempt, disregard of the respect due to judicial administration and disobedience to judicial determination.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota has said in State v. Court (52 Minn., 283):

> If the whole of chapter 87—

That being the chapter relating to contempts—were swept away, there would remain unimpaired the inherent power of the court to punish for contempts.

I know, Mr. President, that it is argued that our Federal inferior courts are not courts named in the Constitution, and that this affords some ground for the argument that trials for contempt in such inferior courts can be had by jury; but the judicial power of the United States is "vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." What is that judicial power? It is the power to hear and determine the causes brought before the court within its jurisdiction and to enforce its judgments, its orders, and its decrees. That is the judicial power; and though the Federal inferior courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, they have in their creation this inherent power, as a part of the judicial power, to punish as for contempt of their authority disobedience to their orders and decrees. That has been laid down again and again. Calling attention, first, to another State court decision, In re Chadwick (109 Mich., 588; 67 N. W., 1071), the court says:

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in and as ancient as the courts themselves. The contempts that are thus punishable are either direct, which openly insult or resist the powers of the court or the persons of the judges who preside there, or else consequential, which, without such gross insolence or indirect opposition, plainly tend to create a universal disregard of their authority. It is apparent that this power should be lodged in the court. The judicial department is entirely distinct from the legislative, and the Constitution leaves the power existing in the court as it was at common law.

The case of In re Carter, the Virginia case, has been referred to, and I sent for the report containing that case. The court held there that the law of the State providing for trial by jury in contempt cases was unconstitutional. I first merely read from the syllabus, and later shall call attention to one paragraph in the decision which relates to the acts of the legislature limiting the power of the court in contempt cases. This decision and this reference in the paragraph to which I shall call the attention of the Senate will explain the United States law of 1831 relative to contempts, to which reference has been made. The syllabus is to this effect:

There is an inherent power of self-defense and self-preservation in the courts of this State created by the Constitution. This power may be regulated by the legislature, but can not be destroyed or so far diminished as to be rendered ineffectual.

That is exactly in accord with the language of Chief Justice Ryan in the Wisconsin case:

It is a power necessarily resident in and to be exercised by the court itself, and the legislature can not deprive such courts of the power to summarily punish for contempts by providing for a jury trial in such case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Where does the court get the power of which the Senator says the legislature can not deprive it? What is the source of it? This is a matter of very great interest and one which has been the subject of a number of current controversies. I should like to have the Senator's views as to the origin of a power in any department of the Government which is beyond the control of the people of that Government.

Mr. STERLING. Briefly answering the Senator, Mr. President, I will say that the power must be inherent in the constitution of the court itself, without a word in the law or any statute in reference to the power. If a court is created and given certain jurisdiction, it has, as inherent in the judicial power conferred upon it, the power to command obedience to its orders and its decrees. That, to my mind, is the foundation of the power.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me just for a remark?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This inherent power in the courts, of which we so often hear, sounds to me a great deal like the old claim of the divine right of kings, which had its origin in some place other than the people inhabiting the land and setting up the government.

Courts are constituted by the Constitution, and they have whatever powers are expressly or impliedly given by the Constitution. Of course the legislature has no right to change or modify those powers; but, in so far as the Constitution is not applicable, I fail to understand the reasoning which leads to the conclusion that the legislative power can not regulate and change the structure and jurisdiction of courts.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think that the power which the Senator is discussing is inherently essential, because without it decrees of the court may be defied and nullified. A court decree is good for nothing unless the tribunal which issues it has the power to enforce it, and among the things which experience has found necessary to the enforcement of judgments and decrees is that of summary punishment of those who disregard or defy them.

I am not prepared to say, as to the question the Senator from Washington is now discussing, that there can be no limitation placed upon the exercise of this power; but as to its origin, I think that it springs from the absolute necessity of the case, since in its absence the decrees of the courts might become as meaningless as an order of the Belgian King and Parliament requiring the Kaiser to retire from its borders. It is an inherent and essential part of the equipment of every court of general jurisdiction.

One might ask where the courts get their equity powers. Certainly not from parliaments or legislatures. They are not based upon statutes, but find their origin in a long line of precedents which have been established by conditions demanding relief which the common law and its machinery did not cover. As a system and branch of jurisprudence, these powers are more far-reaching and extensive than the original common-law power of the courts from which they have been evolved.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his statement. He has made a very clear one, and one which I think perhaps is covered by the more general statement made in regard to the power being necessary for the purpose of enforcing the decrees and orders of the court; otherwise, they might be absolutely nugatory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The statement of the Senator from Colorado is very logical and very clear, and, of course, everyone must agree that if the court has jurisdiction it has an implied power to do those things that are necessary to exercise its jurisdiction; but I fail to see how that proposition can be carried to the extent of limiting the power of the legislature to change the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not so assert. I simply sought to answer the question as to the origin of the power. The matter of its limitation as to indirect contempts by legislative authority is an entirely different proposition. That has been done by Congress in the act of 1831, which relieves criticisms of the judiciary by the press or by word of mouth, and not in the presence of the court, of the element of contempt.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The power as to the origin, of which I inquired of the Senator from South Dakota, is the asserted inherent power in the court, which is above the legislature and apparently above constitutions. I do not direct the question to any particular claim that has been made here just now, but to the argument bearing upon that general subject. I have a number of cases in mind where courts have set aside or held void acts of the legislature because they were alleged to be in conflict with what they called the inherent powers of the courts. I deny that there are any inherent powers of the courts that are not derived from the Constitution and the statutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator will admit that the power to punish for contempt committed in the presence of the court is not only an inherent but an absolutely essential power.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree to that.

Mr. THOMAS. And I do not believe it is one which the legislature could take away from the courts, because otherwise they might be reduced to a condition of subserviency and worthlessness that would result in destroying their usefulness.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree entirely with what the Senator says, but that is an argument that must be addressed to the law-making power.

Mr. THOMAS. I think not; not in so far as it applies to contempts committed in the presence of the court, because if the court can not summarily prevent and punish such contempts it would necessarily cease to be an effective agency of government. The insolence or the animosity of an individual or a number of individuals manifested toward the courts in contemptuous and utter disregard of their commands and authority in their immediate presence would lead as certainly to their dissolution, if their power to punish such conduct were taken away or minimized, as the day follows the night.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That may be true, and it is inconceivable, if the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me for a second, that any legislature or any constitution-making body would deprive a court of the power summarily to punish for contempts committed in the presence of the court, but, nevertheless, I fail to understand the argument which denies the power to the law-making body to do so if it should see fit. The very argument of the Senator must convince him, if he applies it, that that is the case. His argument is that the absence of such a power would lead to the destruction of the court.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a second—the law-making power of the Government has the power to destroy the court. It created the court; it can destroy it; and, if it sees fit to do so, if it deems it wise to do so, may deprive it of the essential powers necessary for its existence.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator in making that remark refers to Federal courts; but if the Senator from South Dakota will indulge me for a moment, I can illustrate the effect of the absence of this authority to punish direct contempts by an incident occurring under my own observation.

In 1904 there was a strike in the Cripple Creek mining district in my State. The militia was mobilized by the governor, at the request of the authorities, and a number of miners were arrested and deprived of their liberty by the military authorities upon information that they were disregarding the laws; that their attitude was dangerous and tended to riotous conditions. The district court thereupon issued a writ of habeas corpus commanding the general of the forces to bring those men before him and to show cause, if any existed, why they should not be restored to their liberty. A response was made to the writ, and the court, after hearing all the testimony, decided that these men had been unjustly and unlawfully deprived of their liberty, and ordered their release; whereupon the general commanding the militia rose in full uniform, saluted the court, and declared that under the authority vested in him by the governor he would do no such thing, and marched out with his prisoners in absolute defiance of the court and its processes. The men were afterwards released, but upon the order of the governor.

That is a good illustration of the utter imbecility to which a court can and will be reduced if it has not the power to punish such contempts as are committed immediately in its presence and in defiance of its authority. Hence I say that it is impossible to conceive of the existence, much less the usefulness, of a court unless it has the power to punish contempts of its authority and of its decrees that are committed in its immediate presence.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Washington does not distinguish between jurisdiction and judicial power. I agree that the legislature may limit as it pleases the jurisdiction of any court relative to subject matter, relative to parties, and so on, but having conferred the jurisdiction, whether limited or not, the legislature by the mere creation of the court confers this judicial power. So in every court of the United States is vested the judicial power, a part of which is the necessary power to enforce its orders and decrees.

Mr. President, reverting to what the Senator from Colorado has said in regard to the power of the court to punish for direct contempts those committed in the presence of the court, and the necessity for the existence of such a power, because otherwise the court itself might be destroyed, permit me to say that, perhaps not so immediately but just as effectually, might the power of the court and the authority of the court be destroyed, and in effect and substance the court itself destroyed, if by indirect contempts the authority and orders of the court could be set aside and rendered of no effect by the party against whom they were made; for why a court at all and the existence of a court unless its orders and decrees rendered within its jurisdiction may be enforced?

Now, a paragraph here from a decision in an Ohio case, Hale v. The State (55 Ohio, 36 L. R. A.), which points out the distinction between jurisdiction and the inherent power of the courts; it is pertinent to the inquiry of the Senator from Washington.

> The difference between the jurisdiction of courts and their inherent powers is too important to be overlooked. In constitutional governments their jurisdiction is conferred by the provisions of the constitution and of statutes enacted in the exercise of legislative authority. That, however, is not true with respect to such powers as are necessary to the orderly and efficient exercise of jurisdiction. Such powers, from both their nature and their ancient exercise, must be regarded as inherent. They do not depend upon express constitutional grant, nor in any sense upon the legislative will. The power to maintain order, to secure the attendance of witnesses to the end that the rights of parties may be ascertained, and to enforce process to the end that effect may be given to judgments, must inhere in every court or the purpose of its creation fails. Without such power, no other could be exercised.

And we shall see that the power naturally and necessarily extends as well to indirect contempts, or those committed out of the presence of the court, as to those committed in the presence of the court.

Recurring now to the paragraph from Carter's case, cited by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the court's view in that case of the United States statute of 1831, with reference to which comment was made, the court declares unconstitutional the Virginia statute providing for trial by jury in contempt cases. The court then goes on to say, in commenting on the case of Ex parte Robinson, which arose under the United States statute of 1831, limiting the cases which could be punished for contempt by United States courts, as follows:

> It may be remarked, also, with respect to the case of Ex parte Robinson, that, although the United States statute of 1831 carefully enumerates the subjects for which courts may punish summarily for contempt, that enumeration is so comprehensive as to afford complete protection to the courts in the performance of their duties and contains no limitation whatever upon the power to punish in the enumerated cases, and that, while punishment which courts may inflict is limited to fine and imprisonment, their discretion is without limit as to the amount of the fine or the duration of the imprisonment.

Notwithstanding the statute of 1831, there were still left, by the very terms of the statute, all the powers necessary for the court to maintain its authority with reference to any act committed in its presence or with reference to any disobedience of its order or decree out of the presence of the court.

Just one further quotation, and that is from the Gompers case, found in Two hundred and twenty-first United States. Justice Lamar says:

> For while it is sparingly to be used, yet the power of courts to punish for contempts is a necessary and integral part of the independence of the judiciary, and is absolutely essential to the performance of the duties imposed on them by law. Without it they are mere boards of arbitration whose judgments and decrees would be only advisory.
> If a party can make himself a judge of the validity of orders which have been issued, and by his own act of disobedience set them aside, then are the courts impotent, and what the Constitution now fittingly calls the "judicial power of the United States" would be a mere mockery.
> This power "has been uniformly held to be necessary to the protection of the court from insults and oppressions while in the ordinary exercise of its duties, and to enable it to enforce its judgments and orders necessary to the due administration of law and the protection of the rights of suitors."

Mr. President, these are the views of the highest authority in the land, and I think we ought to hesitate long before we make this great innovation upon the practice, as I say, of more than 100 years. There is neither occasion nor general demand for it. There is no ground for it in abuses arising out of the present practice nor as the practice has been for many years. The cases of abuse of authority on the part of the courts in punishments for contempt or in the imposition of excessive fines are few and far between. With the progress of society, with the advancement of our jurisprudence, the courts themselves have become more considerate, and the tendency is to fit the administration of the law to the needs and conditions of the times and in accordance with public opinion. I have no fear that hereafter there will be any abuse—or if any, but rare abuse—of this power conferred upon the courts.

Mr. President, one further consideration, and that is this: I referred to the procedure, to the delays in jury trials, to the difficulty in getting a jury, to the difference in the rules of evidence between cases where the party has not committed a crime and cases where the party has committed a crime. The man who has committed no assault in his act constituting contempt of court is convicted on a preponderance of the evidence. The man who has assaulted or, it may be, killed an officer in resistance to the service of process is given all the benefits of the rules in regard to the trial of criminal cases, such as that his contempt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and so on.

But, further, in addition to the procedure and besides the constitutional question, there is the question of public policy. What issue will be tried when the party charged with contempt, especially in a certain class of cases, is brought before the court? The fear, the grave fear, is—and the fear is not without foundation—that the issue will not be alone as to whether a crime was committed in the act constituting the contempt. But the fear is that the issue will be whether or not there was sufficient cause for the "strike." That will be the question; and under the latitude taken by or allowed to the lawyer in a criminal defense, that issue, just as far as possible, will be brought into the case to confuse and prejudice the jury trying it. In the interest of society and good government we ought not to invite such a condition.

Mr. President, I know of no better way to bring discredit upon and disrespect for the authority of the courts, on which we must so largely rely for the permanence and the safety of our institutions, than to provide for trial by jury the great class of contempt cases to which this provision is meant to apply.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, only two committee amendments remain undisposed of. I hope they will be taken up and agreed to. The first one, a mere verbal amendment, is on page 29, in line 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 7, after the word "accused," the committee propose to strike out the word "person."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 6, after the word "months," the committee proposes to strike out the period and to insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That in any case the court or a judge thereof may, for good cause shown, by affidavit or proof taken in open court or before such judge and filed with the papers in the case, dispense with the rule to show cause, and may issue an attachment for the arrest of the person charged with contempt; in which event such person, when arrested, shall be brought before such court or a judge thereof without unnecessary delay and shall be admitted to bail in a reasonable penalty for his appearance to answer to the charge or for trial for the contempt; and thereafter the proceedings shall be the same as provided herein in case the rule had issued in the first instance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know how important this amendment may be; but whether it is important or not, I think we ought to have more than 13 or 14 Senators present. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hollis	Norris	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hughes	O'Gorman	Smoot
Brady	Johnson	Overman	Swanson
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Thomas
Camden	Kenyon	Pittman	Thornton
Chamberlain	Kern	Poindexter	Townsend
Chilton	Lane	Pomerene	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Walsh
Culberson	Lewis	Reed	Weeks
Cummins	McCumber	Shafroth	Williams
Fall	McLean	Sheppard
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shields
Gore	Myers	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether that concludes the committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does, as printed in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If it is in order, I desire to offer an amendment as section 24, and I call the attention of the committee to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is in order, and it will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, to stand as section 24, and to read:

SEC. 24. If any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall, for any reason, be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I may say I submitted that amendment to the chairman of the committee a few days ago and he approved of it. It was inserted in the revenue bill and also in the banking and currency bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the amendment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. BORAH. Are we through with committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have finished the committee amendments printed in the bill. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. So far as I know, the Committee on the Judiciary have no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. I offer an amendment to section 22, as follows:

After the word "justice," in line 7, page 31, I move to strike out the following words:

Nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act.

So that section 22 will read as follows:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, but the same may be punished in conformity to the usuages at law and in equity now prevailing.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I think the Senate is entitled to know the considerations which induced the committee to leave this provision in the bill, and I desire to say in this connection that I can not agree with the Senator from Idaho that there is anything about this that is in the nature of class legislation, or the granting to one class of rights and privileges not enjoyed by other classes.

Section 19 provides that the trial shall be by jury in case of those contempts which constitute a violation of some Federal or State law, so that it does not make any difference whether it is the employer or the employee who has violated the injunction; the trial is by jury. Of course, so far as our experience goes, we do not have very many injunctions by the employee against the employer, but if such a condition should arise the same right would exist. Likewise, by the provisions of section 22, the proceedings outlined are not made applicable in actions brought by the Government of the United States.

I desire to say simply a word with reference to that, to explain it to the Senate—not that I indorse the principle which it embodies. It was argued that there is a proper basis for a distinction. If you will recur to section 15, it will be observed that considerable formality is thrown about the issuance of a preliminary injunction or a temporary restraining order. Requirements are exacted not now insisted upon, making it more difficult than heretofore to obtain an injunction; or, if not more difficult, at least more definite proof must be made. Delays may follow in some instances. For instance, it is provided that "no temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result"; and then the temporary restraining order "shall be indorsed with the date and hour of issuance, shall be forthwith filed" with a recital of the reasons why it is issued, and so on.

It was urged, however, that an action might be brought by the Government of the United States against parties who, as in the case referred to by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], were interfering with the passage of the mails, and immediate action would be necessary. There is a proper distinction between a suit brought by a private individual or a private corporation for the vindication and establishment of a mere private right and a suit brought by the Government, representing the whole body of the people, to safeguard and protect a public right. Section 22 gives expression to that difference, which everybody will recognize. Whether or not it constitutes a sufficient reason for making a distinction in the procedure in case of injunction I do not undertake to say; but that is the reason for the existence of section 22.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Idaho. I understand that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is about to make a motion to go into executive session. The amendment offered by the Senator is an important one, and it ought to be printed. If he would consent to let this motion lie over until to-morrow, the amendment could then be before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would further suggest that as the bill is to go over I think it ought to be printed with the amendments as agreed to, so that we can better understand it to-morrow. Will the Senator agree to that suggestion?

Mr. REED. It certainly would be satisfactory to me. I have no authority to speak for anyone but myself.

In this connection I desire to offer now or to give notice now of certain amendments which I propose to introduce and have them take the same course and be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let them be printed in the bill with some distinctive mark.

Mr. REED. I ask that they be printed as amendments, so that they can be offered then.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has informed me that he desires to move an executive session, and I am willing that this question shall go over until to-morrow, if that is the desire.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the object of certain words contained in the bill, and which, as I understand, he proposes to strike out as follows:

And all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act.

I understand the amendment proposes to strike out these words.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; the motion which I made proposes to strike out all after the word "justice" except the words "but the same may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing."

Mr. SHIELDS. The words I have referred to are intended to provide for contempts covered by section 258 of the Judicial Code in these words:

> Misbehavior of any of the officials of said court in their official transactions and the disobedience or resistance by any of such officers, or by any juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, or command of said court.

The Senator will readily see that a great many of the acts here referred to may be committed out of the presence of the court and concern matters absolutely necessary in order to proceed with a trial of a case. For instance, an officer may refuse to summon witnesses or execute other process, jurors may leave the court, a witness may fail to obey a summons, and thus stop a trial. I think, with the Senator's attention called to these matters, he will modify his amendment so as not to exclude the words to which I have referred.

Mr. BORAH. As the measure is going over, I will consider the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Indiana whether it is the purpose to reassemble in legislative session after the session has concluded?

Mr. KERN. Keeping in mind the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] yesterday as to the length of time he would occupy, I would say that there can be no further legislative session to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. That being the proposition, I desire to present certain amendments, which I shall offer when the bill is again under consideration. First, I call attention to the amendment I have already presented as a substitute for section 7. It is printed. I ask that the amendment I sent to the desk yesterday as a substitute for section 8 be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both amendments, proposing substitutes for sections 7 and 8, have been printed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a substitute for a part of section 9 that I desire to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, without objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present also two amendments, which I shall propose to the last paragraph of section 18.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will venture to suggest—though, perhaps, it is not necessary, as the clerks at the desk are always accurate in these matters—that the amendments agreed to be printed in the bill, when it is reprinted so that we can understand them, and that the amendments which are offered be printed with a different designation, either in small capitals or in some other way, so that when we come——

Mr. CULBERSON. I hope the Senator will not ask that amendments offered and not adopted shall be printed with the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it would be much better for us to have the amendments directly in front of us in the bill. We have often done it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Such a print is very confusing, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an impression that it is less so than to have them on the table where we do not see them as they are called up individually.

Mr. CULBERSON. They will be on the desks of Senators.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, whatever the Senator from Texas desires on that subject I will agree shall be done.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the bill be reprinted with the amendments as agreed to by the Senate up to this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I ask that all amendments which have been submitted as amendments to be offered be printed together as a pamphlet, so that we may have them before us in one print.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no objection to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the names of the Senators proposing them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk several amendments to the pending bill, and I give notice that I shall offer them to-morrow. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. I send to the desk certain amendments which I shall offer to-morrow and which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit an amendment to the pending bill and I give notice that I shall offer it to-morrow. I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against an increased tax on cigars, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Clyde, Mich., and a petition of sundry citizens of Grandville and Byron Center, Mich., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 6400) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Sturgis, Mich.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 6401) granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Dawson (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 6402) granting an increase of pension to Grace W. Post (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 6403) donating the old iron fence around Vance Park, Charlotte, N. C., to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter, to be placed around Craighead Cemetery, near Sugar Creek Church, in Mecklenburg County; and

A bill (S. 6404) to provide for sale of portion of post-office site in Gastonia, N. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BRADY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to ask permission to have referred to the Committee on Printing a letter from Mr. M. O. Leighton, with reference to the Adamson power bill, in which he makes some very important suggestions with reference to it. While I do not vouch for all the suggestions contained in the letter, I think it contains some very valuable suggestions with reference to the bill. I ask that the letter may be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the absence of the chairman of the committee I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. MYERS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries.

having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

H. L. MYERS,
C. S. THOMAS,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

RESERVATION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MYERS. Before the motion for an executive session is made I desire to state that the conferees appointed upon the bill (S. 657) to authorize the reservation of public land for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects in the State of Montana, and for other purposes, were Senators MYERS, SMITH of Arizona, and SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has gone away and will be gone some weeks. Before he left he told me he could not serve as one of the conferees and that he would like to be relieved and have some one else appointed in his place. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] be relieved from further service on the conference and that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] be substituted in his stead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OPTIMISM AND OPPORTUNITY.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I understand it is the purpose of the leader, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], to move that we go into executive session. Just previous to that I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may read a very short article. It will take me but a minute, and I should like to have it go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to say as a preface to that which I shall read that these are troublesome times throughout the world. We are wont too often to bewail our lot. I feel it is most refreshing and sustaining in these days to read and spread before the country the sentiments which I find in a daily newspaper. They are from a most extensive and responsible firm.

OPTIMISM AND OPPORTUNITY.

As we said in our advertisement of August 16, "It is very good these days to be an American."

During this month our country has encountered a trying experience in which our finances, our foreign trade, and even our domestic business have been disturbed by the sudden and tremendous wars in our ancestral countries.

Yet we are coming out of it well.

The President, with his Cabinet and the Congress and the cooperation of bankers and business men called to Washington for the purpose, have promptly and nobly met the emergency by sensible rulings and wise laws, which will largely free our industries and commerce from restraint.

They have arranged for the issuance of emergency currency, through amendment of the Aldrich-Vreeland law, under which national banks can obtain all the currency needed for legitimate business.

They have organized the Federal Reserve Board which will insure the opening of the 12 new Federal reserve banks inside of 60 days, thus giving ample banking facilities for business to every section of our country.

They have amended the ship-registry laws so that American capital will buy foreign ships, which together with the large number of ships already owned by Americans will fly the flag of the United States and furnish ample carrying capacity for our foreign trade.

They have opened the Panama Canal, and thus provided shorter routes for our commerce with South America, Australia, and the Far East.

They have under consideration a plan of financing the surplus cotton crop, so that our southern planters will be enabled to hold their cotton until normal markets are restored.

The Studebaker Corporation, with its 62 years of business experience, its thousands of employees, and its millions of capital invested appreciates the patriotic work that has been done and the opportunities thereby afforded.

Speaking from our experience and immediate forecast of possibilities, we feel cheerful and optimistic over the outlook for profitable business and steady employment of labor with increasing developments of foreign trade in neutral countries.

America is to-day the clearing house of the world.

The great nations of the earth are depending upon the integrity of her friendship, the safety and saneness of her diplomacy, the extensiveness of her trade, and the soundness of her finance.

It is a time for Americans to show their optimism, their patriotism, and their aggressive earnestness.

The foundations of our national prosperity have been laid too deep and too strong to be seriously disturbed even by so great a catastrophe as the war of all Europe.

We regret deeply and sincerely that the war must be, yet we are in nowise to blame and are happily far removed from the theater of activities.

Friendship we feel for all, and toward all we must remain in both thought and action entirely neutral.

Our duty to ourselves and our moral obligation to the rest of the world compel us Americans to be up and doing, to maintain a cheerful and hopeful spirit, to operate our industries and enterprises, to pay our bills as usual, and to conduct our affairs generally on conservative but enthusiastic lines.

This is from the great firm of South Bend, Ind.—the Studebaker Corporation. I feel it should commend itself to every American citizen, regardless of what may be his political affiliation.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a very fine advertisement, and I think it is proper that Studebaker should have the benefit of having it circulated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I offer it with no spirit to advertise the Studebaker concern or any other concern, but I realize, as the Senator from New Hampshire must, that where there is a disposition in some sections of our country and on the part of some individuals—I would not lay it to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire—to cry "mad dog," a firm of that character, issuing sentiments of that kind, should at least have the credit of being patriotic.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they will sell more wagons and automobiles.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not care whether it has that effect or not; and the sentiment is good, whether the Senator approves it or not.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I regret to be obliged to ask the Senate for a leave of absence for myself until next Monday or Tuesday, on account of illness in my family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for leave of absence until Monday or Tuesday of next week. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 hours and 15 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Friday, August 28, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, August 29, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate August 28 (legislative day of August 25), 1914.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 28, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that there are so many good hearts and true in this old world of peace and turmoil, victories and defeats, doubts and uncertainties, joys and sorrows, for which we for the most part are responsible. "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." Hence, we most fervently pray for more strong, pure, noble, generous, true, brave hearts, that we may have less war, more peace; less hate, more love; less criminations and recriminations, more charity and brotherly kindness, that the old world may rejoice in the things which make for righteousness. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire that a quorum may be present here this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did I understand that the point of no quorum has been made, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House, and on that I demand a division.

The motion was agreed to.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes none.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 311 Members have answered to their names—a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and the Clerk will read the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, next Monday is the fifth Monday of the month. The Unanimous Consent Calendar is far behind. I am hoping it will not be many Mondays before we get an adjournment. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that business that is in order on the first and third Mondays of the month may be in order on next Monday, so that the Unanimous Consent Calendar can be taken up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks that on next Monday, which is the fifth Monday, business that is in order on the first and third Mondays shall be in order. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. MOON, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, and Mr. RUSSELL rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the conference report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1108).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 7967, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 4 and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of the words "but the balance to the credit of any person, exclusive of accumulated interest, shall not exceed $1,000" the following: "but the balance to the credit of any person, upon which interest is payable, shall not exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of the words "Provided, That no interest shall be paid on such part of the balance to the credit of any person as is in excess of $500" the following: "Provided, That the board of trustees may, in its discretion, and under such regulations as such board may promulgate, accept additional deposits not to exceed in the aggregate $500 for each depositor, but upon which no interest shall be paid"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN A. MOON,
S. W. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
N. P. BRYAN,
JOSEPH L. BRISTOW,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the accompanying statement.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 1, to strike out words in line 5, "provides that," and insert the words "reads." "but," is a mere change in phraseology and is agreed to by the House managers.

The second amendment is agreed to with an amendment, as shown in the report. The effect of this amendment is to limit the deposit of any one person to a thousand dollars, exclusive of accumulative interest.

The third amendment is agreed to with an amendment, the effect of which is to limit payment of interest on deposits by any one person to the amount of $500, but authorizes the board of trustees to receive an additional $500 from such person, upon which no interest shall be paid.

The fourth amendment is agreed to. It amends a portion of section 9 of the postal saving act, Public Law No. 268, by reenactment of that section, leaving out that part which provides that "not exceeding 30 per cent of the amount of postal funds may at any time be withdrawn by the trustees for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States," and so on, and inserting "when in the judgment of the President war or other exigencies involving the credit of the United States so requires, the board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings fund, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in bonds or other securities of the United States," and so on. This amendment also provides that postal savings funds may be deposited in solvent National or State banks, whether member banks or not of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913. This last-named act is construed to require all postal savings deposits to be placed in a bank that is a member of a reserve bank. This provision would therefore operate to that extent as a repeal of that part of the Federal reserve act which requires deposits to be placed in a reserve bank. The main purpose of the creation of a Postal Savings System was to draw money out of hiding by giving the control of it, on deposit, to the Government and rendering the depositors safe and retaining the fund as far as practicable in solvent banks in the community where it was collected. There are many localities where there are no banks that are members of the reserve banks. Money deposited in the Postal Savings System in such places would have to be removed, perhaps a great distance from the localities where it was collected, and taken to a reserve bank to be deposited. If this section does not become a law. This, we think, would be unfair, both to the people in such localities and the Postal Savings System, and we therefore recommend the adoption of the conference report.

JOHN A. MOON,
S. W. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield some time?

Mr. MOON. I will yield after I have made a short statement myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the postal savings bank was created and went into operation in 1911. It has been very difficult on the part of the department to get the system into full and effective operation so as to prevent loss to the Government. There was a considerable loss for the first two years, but I am advised now that the postal savings bank is running at a slight profit.

The trouble that this special department of the Postal System has had has arisen from the limitations that have been placed upon the right of depositors to deposit money in the banks. The purpose of the bill that is now before the House on the conference report is to raise the limit. The House suggested that all limit be taken away on deposits on which no interest should be paid except the sum of $1,000. The Senate does not agree to that and has offered a proposition of $500 instead of $1,000 upon which interest may be paid, with the provision that the trustees may, in their discretion, under such general rules as they may promulgate, accept $500 more by a single depositor, without interest. After considerable conference and discussion of the matter, in the interest of the service the House managers agreed to it, because it is a policy that looks to the ultimate perfection of the system and is designed to make it not only self-sustaining but, in a manner, remunerative to the Government. It was not just what we wanted, but it was the best we could get.

Under the Federal reserve bank act it was provided that all funds of the postal savings banks should be placed in some reserve bank or member bank in the reserve system. An amendment was offered that provides a repeal, so far as that provision of the Federal reserve bank act is concerned, so as to enable deposits to be placed not only in reserve banks, but in State banks, trust companies, and savings banks that do not belong to that system. The conference committee thought that that was just both to the localities where the money was collected and to the proper operation of the system, and reported in favor of accepting that amendment.

Now there are on deposit—and I give round figures as of date July 31—about $45,000,000, which has been gathered up and placed in the postal savings bank upon which the Government is paying 2 per cent interest and loaning the money under the provisions of that law at 2½ per cent. There are 397,000 of these postal savings depositors in the United States. The postal savings fund deposits are at the present time in 3,600 national banks and 3,100 State banks, savings banks, and trust companies. The State banks, savings banks, and trust companies hold about $17,000,000 of these deposits. The balance is in national banks. The average deposit in all banks is about $109. Five hundred and eighty thousand dollars of postal savings bonds have been redeemed by the Board of Trustees at the request of the owners. The total postal savings bonds issued under the provisions of the act are about $5,000,000 in all.

The department is of the opinion from the various communications that have been received from the postmasters of the United States who have charge of these depositaries that these deposits will be very greatly enlarged if the limit is taken off, as provided in this conference report.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question, if it will not break the continuity of his talk?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. On how much is interest paid?

Mr. MOON. On not over $500.

Mr. HOWARD. Not over $500, and no one person is allowed to deposit over $1,000 under any conditions?

Mr. MOON. Interest can not be paid on over $500 to any one person, and the deposit may exceed that by $500 more. It involves the keeping of two accounts—an interest-bearing account and a noninterest-bearing account.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman please state to the House, for its information, how much was appropriated for the maintenance of the system for this fiscal year? For the present fiscal year was it not $600,000?

Mr. MOON. I do not recollect the precise figures, but that is near it.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the Government is really losing under this system, whereunder $45,000,000 of deposits are held, a sum equivalent to $375,000 this year?

Mr. MOON. The Government was losing up to six months ago, when the figures were $350,000, but now the savings banks are running at a slight profit, owing to the changes, and possibly making a profit of $100,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I was trying to conjure in my mind how they could arrive at that conclusion, when one-half of 1 per cent on $45,000,000 would not be anything like the amount appropriated for the maintenance of the system this year.

Mr. MOON. It will be arrived at by an estimate of the cost of the maintenance and operation of the system. We have not as yet any details, and therefore can not give it in detail.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the banks are taking this money pretty rapidly from the postal savings bank?

Mr. MOON. The banks heretofore have not been very eager to take this money, but in the last few months they are making more demands than the department can supply.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not the opportunity coming pretty soon to raise the rate from 2½ to 3 per cent and make the system pretty nearly self-supporting?

Mr. MOON. It is possible that that opportunity will come later on. It is not reported, however, in this measure before the House. When you come to consider the fact that this money is loaned to banks at a profit of one-half of 1 per cent, and that the banks have to go out and buy the collateral and put it up with the Government, and that the Government has the right to call this money at will, and that there is no risk in these loans made by the Government to the banks, it will clearly appear that 2½ per cent interest will possibly pay the Government more than if the machinery were provided by which this sum could be loaned to individuals through the country at even 3 or 3½ per cent.

Mr. BORLAND. The withdrawals from the postal funds are not very numerous, are they—less than they would be from an ordinary banking account?

Mr. MOON. Not so much as they would be from an ordinary banking account, because they are put there for the purpose of saving.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BATHRICK. In this bill it is set forth that the interest shall not be less than 2½ per cent. Does the gentleman believe that a lower rate of interest will be paid by the banks to this Postal Savings System?

Mr. MOON. The interest that is actually paid to the Government is 2½ per cent.

Mr. BATHRICK. I know; but the bill says that the interest paid by the banks to the Government shall not be less than 2½ per cent.

Mr. MOON. Two and one-half per cent is actually paid.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is any less rate than 2½ per cent paid by the banks now?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. BATHRICK. Why does it say 2½ per cent in this bill if 2½ per cent is actually paid?

Mr. MOON. That was just the discretion that was allowed in the act. The department in the execution of the act exacts 2½ per cent.

Mr. BATHRICK. Was that the discretion allowed in the original act?

Mr. MOON. Yes; that was my recollection.

Mr. BATHRICK. It was 2½ per cent in the original act?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up the time of the House in the discussion of some other features connected with this matter, but this is a question of considerable interest to the membership of the House, and I have prepared here some matter that I will ask to place in the RECORD, so that those who want to study this system in comparison with the systems of other countries may do so. I will first put in the RECORD the following statement of the disposition made of the deposits in the postal savings banks of the British Empire:

DISPOSITION MADE OF THE DEPOSITS IN THE POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

United Kingdom: Remitted to head office for reduction of national debt.

New Zealand: Principally invested in Government securities.

New South Wales: Invested in national securities of New South Wales or of any other State in the Commonwealth, debentures specified, etc.

Western Australia: Invested either at fixed deposit with any one of the incorporated banks in Western Australia or loaned to the agricultural bank or for the purchase of Government securities.

Tasmania: Invested in Government securities.

British India: Invested in Government cash balances (Journal Royal Statistical Society, 1897).

Ceylon: Invested in securities of the Governments of the United Kingdom, India, and Ceylon, and such other British colonies as are approved of by the governor in council.

Straits Settlements: Invested in same way as trustee funds—in first-class securities.

Federated Malay States: Deposited with director posts and telegraphs and carried to a separate account.

Canada: Remitted to the postmaster general at Ottawa.

British Guiana: Invested in Government bonds, principally of the British colonies.

Bahamas: Generally invested in approved securities in England, but may be invested locally by governor in council.

Cape of Good Hope: Invested in government stock and treasury bills or in such manner as the governor will approve or require.

Transvaal: Remitted to department of finance for investment.

Orange River Colony: Administered by the treasury.

Sierra Leone: Paid into the colonial treasury for investment in securities yielding interest as the secretary of state (London) may name.

Southern Rhodesia: Invested in trustee stocks.

Gold Coast: Invested in guaranteed securities.

I place this in the RECORD, so that there may be comparison of that with our own. Then I place in the RECORD a statement of the rate of interest, the maximum deposits, the maximum amount drawing interest, and the limitation on the amount deposited for a week, month, or year in the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Canada, Italy, Belgium, Russia, the Netherlands, Hungary, Sweden, Egypt, France, Austria, Japan, Bulgaria, and the Philippine Islands:

Country.	Rate of interest (per cent).	Maximum deposit.	Maximum amount drawing interest.	Limitation on amount deposited per week, month, or year.
United Kingdom	2½	$973.30	$973.30	(1)
New Zealand	3 and 3½	No limit.	(2)	None.
Canada	3	3,000.00	3,000.00	(3)
Italy	(4)	No limit.	772.00	(5)
Belgium	2 and 3	No limit.	(6)	(7)
Russia	4	515.00	515.00	(8)
Netherlands	2.64	No limit.	482.40	None.
Hungary	3	812.00	812.00
Sweden	3.6	No limit.	536.00	None.
Egypt	2½	988.60	988.60	(9)
France	2½	289.50	289.50	(10)
Austria	3	406.00	406.00	(11)
Japan	4.2	498.00	498.00	None.
Bulgaria	4	386.00	386.00	None.
Philippine Islands	2½	No limit.	500.00	(12)

[1] Not to exceed $248.32 in any one year.
[2] 3½ per cent on amounts up to $1,459.95; 3 per cent on amounts from $1,459.95 to $2,919.90.
[3] Not to exceed $1,000 per year except in special cases.
[4] 2.04 per cent in 1910. Fixed annually according to earnings; 3 per cent is average.
[5] Not to exceed $772 in any one year.
[6] 3 per cent on amounts up to $579; 2 per cent on amounts over $579.
[7] Not to exceed $965 in any one fortnight without authority.
[8] Not to exceed $25.75 at any one time.
[9] Not to exceed $247.15 in any one year.
[10] Not to exceed $289.50 in any one year.
[11] Not to exceed $121.80 in any one year after deducting withdrawals.
[12] Varies according to class of office.

I also place in the RECORD a statement showing the statutory restrictions on the amounts that savings banks may receive from depositors, by States.

Wisconsin: Such mutual savings banks may receive on deposit from any person, in his or her own name or in the name of another, in any one year a sum not exceeding $1,000.
Wyoming: None.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOON. I do.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman know any reason why the banks should not pay the Government the rate of interest that they pay other depositors? I believe the minimum is 3 per cent. Why should not the Government get that?

Mr. MOON. I have just stated the reason for that in answer to the inquiry of some gentleman, I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Probably I did not catch the gentleman's answer.

Mr. MOON. I said this, in effect, that while 2½ per cent may be regarded as a low rate of interest for the loaning of money on mortgages and ordinary bonds and securities to individuals, yet when the money is loaned under the guaranties provided in this act and one bank takes it all, or such part as it may desire, the bank has to go into the market and buy securities for the purpose of protecting the Government. The Government runs no risk. It can call back the money when it desires it, and under any other system——

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no one can hear the little dialogue that is going on across the aisle. Gentlemen ought to talk loudly enough so that we can hear.

Mr. MOON. There might be a little better order, but I think I talk loudly enough.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. MOON. It is the difference in the customer, that is all, and the matter of the security, and the right of the Government to loan in bulk instead of in smaller amounts. If this money were loaned to individuals on ordinary notes, securities, or mortgages, the enforcement of collections where there was nonpayment would cost the Government, it is estimated, more than the additional one-half of 1 per cent. But I fully agree with the gentleman from Illinois that after this system is perfected we possibly may provide some rules and regulations by which this money may go to others than banks, and perhaps at a higher rate of interest. It should be done, but these questions are not and could not have been involved in the conference on this bill. This whole system is in embryo. It is an imperfect system as yet. The Government has not been able to make out of it what it expected. That has been done which many of us thought would be done. It was a failure for a while, and it has lost a good deal of money, but it is now upon a self-sustaining basis, and we believe that the adoption of this law will make it more thoroughly self-sustaining than it has been before.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It is my opinion that the limitations and restrictions put upon this postal savings bank law, which is a failure, and only a postal savings bank in name—restrictions and limitations have made it a failure. It is a depository with a limit of depositing only $100 at a time, and not to exceed $500, and there are other restrictions, all of which would indicate that the banking interests of the country have had influence in preventing a real postal savings bank for the benefit of the people of the country; and while I do not raise any objection at this time, I think that in the very near future Congress ought to give the people a real postal savings bank that will be of some benefit to the masses of the people.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman means by the influence of the banks upon Congress. I am sure that the banks have made at no time any suggestions to this committee upon the subject, nor have they made any to the conferees.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I did not intend to infer that they had any influence upon this committee, but the fact is that the people have been demanding for years a postal savings bank, and instead of being given a comprehensive postal savings bank that really amounts to something we have handed them out something that is not of very much value.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, personally I was of opinion, when this law was enacted, that it was not the kind of law that it ought to be, that it did not have the restrictions that it ought to have, that the powers which were vested were not what they ought to be, and I thought that this measure in many respects was unconstitutional, and I have doubt of its constitutionality in part to-day. But, while I was opposed to the whole system to begin with, it has been established by Congress, and it becomes our duty now in obedience to the law of Congress to make it an effective system that will not leave the Government in debt but will enable the Government to obtain revenue from it, and step by step this committee has undertaken to improve it to that end, and that is one of the purposes—the very purpose, so far as it may go, of the bill that is now pending.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of making it so effective that we will take the limitations off and loan this money to the people and the farmers who will give real estate security instead of giving the banks the privilege of collecting the interest upon it.

Mr. MOON. That may come later on. I hope it may, if it can be done under proper restrictions.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. What amount of these deposits, if any, upon which the Government is paying 2 per cent is idle, not drawing the 2½ or 2¼ per cent provided by the law?

Mr. MOON. Practically none of it. It is covered in practically as fast as it is obtained, as I am advised, within the provisions of existing law.

Mr. GOULDEN. How do they do that, if the banks fail to make any demand for it?

Mr. MOON. They are making demands for it, more than they can get, I am told.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then the Government has no trouble upon that score, and I am pleased to learn that fact, as I believe the Government savings banks to be a wise law.

Mr. MOON. None whatever, I think.

Mr. GOULDEN. In having the money taken by the banks on which they pay an interest of 2½ or 2¼ per cent?

Mr. MOON. Yes; 2½ per cent.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If, as the gentleman from Tennessee stated, the amounts now bearing interest are taken up at a profit, why is it that the additional sums—that is, the sum of $500 for each depositor—are not bearing interest?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the Government gets the advantage upon that. It is holding this fund for the purpose of securing the depositor and can not pay profitably—to itself—interest on the full deposits.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would it not encourage the bringing in of additional money?

Mr. MOON. It might encourage the bringing in of additional money, but it might discourage the condition of the Treasury. They do not think it wise to pay interest on more than one-half of the amount deposited. This bill provides for interest on $500, and then provides that $500 may be deposited, without interest, for each depositor.

Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted in introducing some papers in the RECORD, I had reached a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster General upon the subject that we were just discussing. That letter I will insert at this point, calling especial attention to the extracts from reports received from postmasters which are quoted in the letter. The letter is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, August 11, 1914.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: Let me call your attention to the urgency for speedy action on the bill now in conference to increase the amount that may be accepted from a postal savings depositor. Late reports from postmasters show that, while deposits are increasing rapidly, large sums are being rejected on account of the statutory restrictions on deposits. This is not only disappointing to intending depositors, but denies business an enormous amount of hidden money, every dollar of which is especially needed at this time on account of chaotic conditions abroad.

The following extracts from reports received from postmasters in the past few days show the embarrassments and disadvantages of the present limitations on deposits:

Kansas City, Mo., August 6:

"There are indications of the existence of a little uneasiness on account of the war scare. Inclosed is a copy of my monthly statistical report for July, which shows the average number of new accounts opened per day to be 14, including the stations. On Monday, the 3d instant, 56 new accounts were opened at the main office and yesterday 38 were opened. Most of these new depositors deposited the maximum amount of $100 and probably 75 per cent of them wanted to deposit from $200 to $4,000."

On August 6 Chicago reported postal savings deposits aggregating $81,000 for the first four days of the month. During the corresponding period last year $38,132 was received.

New York City, August 3:

"I have to say that not fewer than 20 persons came to this office on Saturday with sums aggregating $16,800, which could not be accepted on account of the present restrictions on deposits. Fifty-three new accounts were opened on Saturday, amounting to $3,800, an average of over $71 for each deposit. A Hungarian and his wife wanted to deposit $500 each. A German wanted to deposit $1,000. Several others desired to deposit $500 and over. To-day, up to 2 p. m., $7,700 had to be refused for the same reason."

South St. Joseph, Mo., August 6:

"I had a Russian depositor this week who wanted to deposit $265, but I could only take $100. A Russian Jew offered $300 for deposit some time since; we took $100, and he carried the other $200 for over 60 days until he could get certificates for the same. We had another customer with $1,100 who took it all away as we could only take $100 of the amount. I might give other instances to show that we do not receive money that the banks can get, and the desirability of accepting the largest amount that may be offered so as to get the money out of hiding and into the channels of business."

Gulfport, Miss., August 3:

"As information I have to report that within the last three days there has been offered by foreigners at this office for deposit in the postal savings bank about $2,500, the tenders being made by four persons, three of whom are Greeks. I presume the war news from Europe has something to do with it. Of course under present conditions we could only take $100 from each of the patrons."

Newark, N. J., August 7:

"The receipts for August 1 were $2.135; for August 3, $6,004; total, $8,139. Corresponding period of 1913 deposits amounted to $1,189. Fifty-five new accounts have been opened so far this month."

Philadelphia, Pa., August 6:

"I beg to report that on the 3d of this month there was refused by the postal savings depository of this office the sum of $2,850, offered for deposit, by reason of the $100 a month limit; and on the 4th instant, for a like reason, the sum of $1,900 was refused."

On August 6 the postmaster at Buffalo reported that deposits aggregating $7,363 were received the first three days in August, as against $4,053 during the last three days in July. In explaining the increase he said:

"Various reasons were advanced by depositors many of whom were anxious to deposit sums in excess of the limit. It is estimated that as much money was refused as was deposited."

Allentown, Pa., August 10:

"This office is compelled to frequently decline deposits of postal savings in excess of the maximum amount allowed to be deposited at one time under the existing regulations, it having been necessary to decline such deposits ranging from $300 to $650 from 10 patrons of this office during the past week."

Seattle, Wash., August 6:

"It is being demonstrated almost daily that the greatest obstacle for improving this service more rapidly is the limited amount of the deposits permitted. We turned away a depositor on the 4th of this month with $16,000, and yesterday two other applications with $1,000 and $2,000 each. This is occurring here so often that I beg to refer to it."

Detroit, Mich., August 6:

"I wish to bring to your attention exceptionally heavy deposits in the postal savings bank during the last few days. The deposits at the main office for the first five business days in August amounted to $27,445, while the deposits for the same period last month were $12,867, or an increase in amount of over 110 per cent. Our withdrawals for the same period have fallen off slightly, the total being $17,080 for the first days in July and only $14,421 for August, making the net gain even greater.

"In addition to the money which we have been able to accept, thousands of dollars have been offered for deposit which we are obliged to refuse on account of the one hundred and five hundred dollar limit. Many of our depositors, or intending depositors, have expressed keen disappointment when they learn of this limit, and it is very hard to convince some that we are unable to accept the money which they are so anxious to intrust to the care of the postal savings. Many times a day intending depositors either come in the office or make inquiries over the phone for information, and in nearly every case surprise is expressed that the statutory limit is so low."

Danville, Ill., August 5 (telegram):

"Greek foreman railway construction gang called office to-day asking if savings department would accept $36,000 deposited in various sums by members gang who are in panic regarding banks. Each individual deposit probably exceeds amount set by law as maximum deposit. If not taken, money will be withdrawn from circulation and may be sent abroad. Is there any emergency clause whereby we can accept deposits in excess of $100?"

Scores of other reports corroborate the urgency for congressional relief and show similar conditions throughout the country. The Postal Savings System, if unfettered without delay, can render a very great public service in the present exigency.

Very respectfully,

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

This all shows that very large amounts have been desired to be deposited, but the department was powerless to accept the money under the law.

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from Tennessee yield me 15 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House last December. It changed the existing law in two or three particulars. It lifted the amount of $500 that could be deposited by any depositor and provided an unlimited amount that might be deposited. It, however, limited the interest that would be paid to $1,000. It also lifted the restriction of a depositor being allowed to deposit only $100 in one month. The bill that comes before you is virtually here with all of those restrictions reinserted, except the last one, permitting the depositor to deposit more than $100 in any one month. Under the bill as it is now before the House he is permitted to deposit only $500. The Senate, by an amendment that was adopted, limited the amount to $1,000 that might be deposited. The conferees, for some unknown reason, struck out the limitation of $1,000 and restored the original amount of $500 that might be deposited and granted the depositors the privilege, in the discretion of the board of trustees, whenever they saw fit, to deposit another $500, which was not to bear interest. I had thought that the House had expressed itself positively enough that it was the wish to let the postal savings depositors have the right to deposit funds without any limit at all. The Senate limited that amount to $1,000, and yet the House conferees go further backward to the original amount of $500, with the privilege that the board of directors may allow the depositors to deposit another additional $500 if they saw fit.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman, I suppose, does not mean to say to the House that the conferees denied the right both as to interest and nonbearing interest——

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, the House conferees went right backward to the position taken by the Senate, and even further backward. Now, if the gentleman will permit, I will make my position clear. The Senate restricted the amount that might be deposited by any depositor to $1,000 and allowed interest on $500.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman gets it wrong; the Senate struck out the $500——

Mr. STAFFORD. I read the report, and I read it carefully, and I am not in error. It says:

Insert in lieu of the words—

And this is the Senate amendment—

"but the balance of the credit of any person, exclusive of accumulated interest, shall not exceed $1,000" the following: "but the balance to the credit of any person, upon which interest is payable, shall not exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest"; and that the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following this is the next amendment:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of the words "Provided, That no interest shall be paid on such part of the balance to the credit of any person as is in excess of $500," and insert the following: "Provided, That the board of trustees may, in its discretion, and under such regulations as such board may promulgate, accept additional deposits not to exceed in the aggregate $500 for each depositor, but upon which no interest shall be paid."

Mr. MOON. That makes $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That confirms what I originally stated—that the Senate placed a limitation on the amount to be deposited of $1,000, and the conferees in conference agreed to striking out the absolute right to deposit $1,000 and restricted it to the original amount of $500, with the permission to deposit an additional $500 if the board of trustees of postal savings banks would permit.

Mr. MOON. I take it that the gentleman from Wisconsin means to convey this idea—that so far as the $500 was concerned, upon which no interest was to be paid, that was in the discretion of the board of trustees.

Mr. STAFFORD. I mean to convey the idea that the individual depositor has no right to deposit more than $500 in a savings bank unless the board of trustees give him permission to increase the deposits by another $500, whereas the Senate amendment, as the bill came over to the House, provided giving to the individual depositor the absolute right to deposit to the extent of $1,000, with the limitation of interest on $500 of deposits. I am not in error in what I said originally as to the position the House conferees took on this matter.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. My time is limited, and I want to get to a more important matter.

Mr. HOWARD. Just to get the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. In the gentleman's opinion, would not complications arise from this limitation? Would it not necessitate the keeping of two accounts against each individual, one on which it had to pay interest and on the other on which it did not pay interest?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; it is a confusing proposition; there is no reason for it. America is the only Government with a postal savings banks institution that pays the lowest rate of interest to the postal savings depositors. This bill is in the interest of the private banks throughout the country.

When the postal savings bank bill was originally presented to this House we had a struggle as to whether all of the deposits should be for the use of the private banks or whether some of those funds should be for the use of the Government. At that time we provided that 30 per cent of these deposits should be at any time at the use of the board of trustees of these postal savings banks. Sixty-five per cent was to be deposited in private banks, State and National, but which could be utilized whenever the President thought that the public welfare demanded it. As the bill comes before us, by section 2 it wipes away that limitation, and permit me before I take up that question to say that these banks, the private, State, and National banks, receive these funds for 2½ per cent. The Government pays 2 per cent, turns that over to the bank, and receives the paltry sum of a quarter of a cent for the use of these funds.

Mr. MOON. No; the gentleman knows the Government pays 2 per cent and loans it at 2½——

Mr. STAFFORD. I meant to say 2½ per cent. The bill authorizes the postal-bank trustees to loan these deposits to the banks at not less than 2½ per cent, and the rate the banks pay is 2½ per cent. Paying the Government only 2½ per cent when in New York the prevailing rate to individual depositors for savings funds is 3½ to 4 per cent. I now wish to direct attention to this very material change, and it is of pressing importance just at the present time when the Government may have need of these postal deposits, totaling $45,000,000, in the purchase of ships to carry our products abroad. There is more in this proposition than you think of at first glance.

Let me read to you the existing law, and then let me read this modification of the law as found on page 3, lines 22 to 25, and following. This is the restriction of the present law, which is not incorporated in this bill, as to the deposit of these funds in the various banks:

Not exceeding 30 per cent of the amount of such funds may at any time be withdrawn by the trustees for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, it being the intent of this act that the residue of such funds, amounting to 65 per cent thereof, shall remain on deposit in the banks in each State and Territory willing to receive the same under the terms of this act, and shall be a working balance and also a fund which may be withdrawn for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, but only by direction of the President and only when, in his judgment—

And mark these words:

The general welfare and the interests of the United States so require.

Now, what are the words substituted in this bill which is about to be offered for adoption? These words are eliminated and the following are substituted:

When, in the judgment of the President, war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires.

There are the words of limitation I wish to lay emphasis on. Not the general welfare of the country, but—war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires, the board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Can there be any question whatsoever but that this proposed language is much more restrictive of the use of these $45,000,000 now on deposit in the various banks throughout the country than the original law, which says that 65 per cent may be used any time in the discretion of the President and when, in his judgment, the general welfare and the interests of the United States shall require?

So eminent a business man as former Postmaster General Wanamaker, in a recent published letter, made the proposal that these $45,000,000 of funds should be utilized for the purchase of ships by the Government to transport our products abroad. And yet no war is confronting us, no exigency involving the credit of the United States is before us. The credit of the United States is sound, and yet we are surrendering by this provision the right of the President when the general welfare of the country requires it to avail ourselves of the use of 65 per cent of the Government postal savings funds in all the banks throughout the country and also of the 30 per cent that the board of trustees now have the right to invest in Government securities. That is the purport and purpose of this amendment. It is restrictive of the powers of the President to-day in the exigency that confronts this Government.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. As to this large fund in the postal savings bank belonging to the people who have deposited there, I should like to ask how, if the people wanted to draw their money, the Government would pay it if it invested this money in ships?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, we know, as the gentleman well knows from his acquaintance with Philadelphia Savings Society's funds, that these savings funds are not to any great amount withdrawn. They are largely lodged there for permanent investment. I would not assume that the President or any department that has charge of these funds would take the 95 per cent of them, but I believe he would be perfectly safe to use at least 50 per cent, because when this Government is not involved in war everyone knows that, with the credit of the Government back of it, there is not going to be any clamor or call for these funds.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. STAFFORD. My time is rapidly going. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman knows that land or ships are not easily negotiable and can not readily be disposed of. People are withdrawing their funds now——

Mr. STAFFORD. The fact is, there is more money in the postal savings banks now than ever before, because people have greater confidence in the Government of the United States than in private banks.

Mr. MOON. I was going to ask the gentleman a similar question to that which was so well put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. On this very proposition you complain that certain language has been taken out of the act, being part of section 9 of the act that created the Postal Savings System, and that certain other language, more restrictive in its character, has been placed in this law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. MOON. Well, in both instances the discretion is absolutely resting with the President. There can be no difference so far as that is concerned. The language is different; but the President, after all, has the discretion of exercising his judgment as he sees fit. Now, the difference, and the only difference, or the practical difference, is that instead of 35 per cent being withdrawn, he would be allowed to withdraw it all, except the 5 per cent reserve.

Mr. STAFFORD. At the present time the board of trustees has absolute right to withdraw for governmental purposes 30 per cent of these funds. Under certain conditions the President has the right to withdraw 65 per cent. What are those conditions? When in his judgment the general welfare and the interests of the United States require. That is the wording of the existing law. He has not unlimited discretion, because we restrict him. These are the restrictive words in the proposal of the committee:

When in the judgment of the President war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires.

There is no war confronting this Government at the present time. There is no exigency involving the credit of the United States. He could make an investment in Government ships to transport our products abroad under the existing phraseology, and yet under this provision he would not have that authority.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman in connection with the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] if he does not think if those restrictions and limitations were taken off the Government would have sufficient money to build all the ships necessary without making any great inroads on the deposits in our postal savings banks?

Mr. STAFFORD. This section 2 that is incorporated in this bill is in the identical phraseology, with one minor exception, as section 9 of the existing law, except as changed in the manner pointed out. There is no reason for restricting it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The section he complains of, as vesting the discretion in the President, is but a reproduction of the section which vests in the President discretion except as to the amount. The language is somewhat different, possibly more restrictive; but, appealing alone to the judgment and discretionary power of the President, discretion in both sections is vested strictly in the President, and it is immaterial what the language may be if the discretionary power is granted and is vested and can be controlled and can not be dislodged. That is the fact here.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] says that there is no sense in this measure. It is hardly necessary for me to say—leaving out the part that the managers on the part of the House have had in the consideration thereof—that it is somewhat of a reflection on the managers on the part of the Senate for him to State that there is no sense in a proposition of this sort. The truth is, my friend from Wisconsin is the best hand to make a "chinquapin point" and conceal a real point I ever met. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOON. I will yield first to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and then to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very simple piece of legislation. It increases the amount that a man can deposit in a postal savings bank from $500 to $1,000, and limits the amount on which interest may be paid to $500, and authorizes the President to use all of such deposits, except the 5 per cent redemption fund, in case of emergency for governmental purposes. That is all there is to it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I will not yield. That is a simple statement of fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. The people deposit their money in the local postal savings banks and the Government pays 2 per cent for it. The Government then deposits the money in the designated depositories and receives 2½ per cent interest thereon. Under the present law the board of managers or the board of trustees, or whatever you call them, are authorized to invest 30 per cent in securities which they have for sale to depositors, who can take their money out of the banks and buy these securities. And now we are authorizing the President to take all of the money, instead of 65 per cent of it; to take 95 per cent of it, and use it, instead of borrowing money by issuing bonds.

That is a simple proposition. It enlarges the powers given to the President. It is a good thing in case of emergency. It is a clear-cut business proposition. It will increase the deposits in the postal savings banks, and it will not increase the amount upon which interest must be paid to any individual. It will encourage more people to deposit their money in the postal savings banks. We shall have more money on deposit there. We shall thereby be able to make the postal savings banks a paying institution instead of a losing one, and we shall at the same time have given to the President of the United States the right to use the money that is there for governmental purposes in case of any great emergency.

Now that is the whole story. It is a thing that there ought not to be any question about, and it ought to be adopted unanimously.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think it is rather mean to take the money of the poor people and invest it in Government bonds at a time when the credit of the Government is involved? It seems to me that is the time when it ought not to be done.

Mr. MADDEN. What you ought to do is to encourage the people to loan money to the Government in any great emergency.

Mr. PLATT. Not the poorest people.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, any people who are willing to loan their money to the Government of the United States ought to be encouraged to do it. The Government is paying interest on it, and the Government ought to be able to use it for any purpose.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Under the present conditions would not the President have the right to purchase ships with the money?

Mr. MADDEN. He would have the right to purchase ships from any money in the Treasury if Congress authorized him to do it. He could use this money.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Under the law as it is to-day would the President be authorized to use it for the purpose of ships?

Mr. MADDEN. Under the law to-day the President can use the money for an emergency, and the money could be used for that purpose to-day under this bill in the discretion of the President of the United States.

Mr. RAKER. In addition to the good features that the gentleman has pointed out, there is another feature of this bill that requires the committee to loan the money in the localities where the money is deposited?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; of course.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to get this thing straight. The discretion is still in the power of the United States to withdraw the money?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. This gives the President the discretion to withdraw all the funds, instead of 65 per cent of the funds. Now I yield the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee give me some time?

Mr. MOON. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes left.

Mr. MOON. I shall have to divide up the time differently, then, Mr. Speaker. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and then I will yield three minutes and one minute as I promised.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield first?

Mr. MOON. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, to discuss this question intelligently within five minutes is almost an impossibility. I had hoped that the House bill would be adopted by the Senate as it left the House.

I wanted to point out just a few limitations that are put upon postal savings deposits that I think will never make the Postal Savings System of this Government profitable, but will always make it run at a loss. For instance, it is said we have $45,000,000 on deposit. Now, $45,000,000, even at one-half of 1 per cent, is only $225,000 a year, and we have appropriated for the current fiscal year $600,000 for this system.

Now, the sensible and sane thing for the Government of the United States to do is to do what every country that has had any experience in dealing with postal savings has done—make this system useful to the American people. The other day the two houses of the British Parliament in 48 hours appropriated $1,025,000,000 to meet an emergency. The other day the Republic of France converted for the use of the Government over $500,000,000 of its postal savings that it had accumulated by the sale of postal savings bonds for years in that country. The opportunity presents itself to the United States Government to build up and make one of the most effective arms of Government support in the Postal Savings System and stabilize the low rate of interest heretofore maintained for our bonds. And yet by the act of 1910 and by amendments thereto they have thrown every limitation and restriction around the use of these banks that would drive investors away instead of inducing them to invest in them.

For instance, let me give you one illustration. Suppose my friend from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] had on deposit $100 in Denver, and he looked at his certificate and saw that his interest was due, how could he collect it? Could he go to the post office in Washington and collect his interest? No; he would have to go down and get a lawyer, if he was not a good enough one himself, to draw a power of attorney, and send that certificate, with the power of attorney, to Denver, Colo., designating a specific person to collect his interest; and that person would return it by money order, which would practically consume the interest. Now, under the present system, this bank will never be used extensively. This year it will be run at a loss of $300,000, and I am willing to wager a burned ginger cake on that proposition. This legislation is not going to bring any more money into the Postal Savings System——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOWARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. I want to give the gentleman the information that the department has given to me, that there will be no loss at the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. HOWARD. I have heard that statement made before, and I say, after four years' close study of the Postal Savings System, that the department is dead wrong, and the future will prove it. Now, who uses the postal savings bank? Foreigners use it, because they are accustomed to using this system in their own country. Practically every country in Europe has a postal savings system, and the foreigners understand it and know how to use it; but when you come to use the system of the Government of the United States there is every restriction and everything on the face of the earth to prevent a man's using it and nothing to encourage it.

What class of American citizens use the postal savings bank? Those who are skeptical of the stability of the savings institutions of the country use it. These people want a simple, everyday, common-sense method of depositing and withdrawing money.

Now, in the State of New York, from which very many distinguished gentlemen hail who are on the floor of this House, they have savings deposits of $2,368,000,000 this minute. One bank—the Bowery Savings Bank, in New York City—has over $100,000,000 on deposit this minute. The Savings Bank of Boston, Mass., has on deposit over $100,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether there is a quorum on the floor of the House, and I will ask the Speaker to ascertain. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MOON. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for a few minutes, until we get through with this.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not do it if the gentleman voted for the resolution the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Browne, Wis.	Dies	Flood, Va.

The SPEAKER. On this call 309 Members have responded to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY].

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the limitation of $1,000. There might be some reason for limiting the amount that a man may deposit within a special period—a month or two months—in order to prevent funds used or required for business purposes, and which would naturally be deposited in commercial banks, from going into these savings banks. But where a man deposits his savings only I can see no good reason for limiting the amount. It simply results in the man putting in the amount he is allowed to deposit and then the additional amount in the name of some other member of the family.

It seems to me that there can be no excuse for the nonpayment of interest on the second $500. This postal savings bank is not established for the benefit of the Government, but for the benefit of poor people.

The chairman of the committee tells us that this year the difference between the 2½ per cent which the banks are required to pay the Government and the 2 per cent which the Government pays the depositors is sufficient to pay the expenses of the administration of these banks. Naturally the profit of one-half per cent on the amount on deposit will increase as the deposits increase. If we can encourage these deposits we will enlarge the amount of the expense fund, and it will be very much easier for the Government to administer it.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman says that the postal savings bank was established for poor people; does not he think that there is a limit to the amount that poor people would deposit? After you get above $1,000 deposit, would not that be made by people of accumulated wealth?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the gentleman to say that the bank was established for the people and not for the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. I understood him to say it was established for the poor people.

Mr. OGLESBY. The man of means who has money to invest will make an investment which will return him more than 2 per cent. If he wants to use it commercially it would be of no use to deposit it in the postal savings bank, and especially if he is limited to $50 or $100 a month he would not use the postal savings banks to get that small return.

Mr. BORLAND. If a man has more than $1,000 saved up he is apt to find some other place to invest it.

Mr. OGLESBY. That may be, but it does not necessarily follow. It is the proposition that on the second $500 no interest is to be allowed that seems to me to be particularly objectionable. I see no reason why, if the Government takes on deposit $1,000, it should not pay interest on the second $500 the same as on the first. It receives interest from the banks on the total deposits. The more money deposited the larger the expense fund and the less proportionate cost to administer the postal savings bank. I think deposits should be encouraged.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OGLESBY. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I quite agree with what my colleague has said. I want to ask him whether, in view of the fact that we have had failures of many private banks such as we had on the east side of New York, it would not be right that the postal savings bank pay interest on the entire thousand dollars, especially, too, in view of the fact that so much has been said in the press that there are so many people who keep money hidden away or hoarded up in secret places, whereas they might be induced to deposit in the postal savings bank if they would get 2 per cent on the additional $500 which, under the agreement of the conferees, is not to bear interest.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is my view.

A great majority of the deposits in the postal savings bank are made by people of foreign birth—people who are largely ignorant of our laws and unfamiliar with our language. They have had unfortunate experiences with so-called private bankers who have gotten their confidence through being able to speak their language, only to abuse it. These experiences have made them suspicious of all banking institutions. This leads to the hoarding of money or the sending it out of the country. It would not be deposited in any of our banks directly, but can be kept in the country and in circulation through the medium of a Government-administered postal savings bank, for all of the people have absolute confidence in the solvency and integrity of Uncle Sam. The postal savings bank should not, and, if properly conducted will not, be a burden on our National Treasury, and can and should be so conducted that it will be of great benefit, especially to our laboring classes. To refuse interest on deposits in excess of $500 will be to erect a serious barrier to its success by discouraging deposits, and without reason.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, in this short time I wish to call attention again to that which has been already said, namely, that while we have raised the amount that can be deposited to $1,000 we have limited the interest which will be paid to $500, and that of itself is a limitation upon the thousand-dollar deposit. The experience of the past has shown that very little money is deposited on which no interest is paid; that if you limit the interest paid on the second $500 it is in fact a complete limitation on the amount that will be deposited. I hope this amendment will be arranged so that interest can be paid on the second $500, and that we will offer this inducement to the people of this country to put their money in the postal savings banks.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, the postal savings bank is a live subject from one end of this country to the other. The first and original purpose of its establishment was to serve the public and bring more closely together the loaning and borrowing public. It is the desire of the country to eliminate as much as possible the expense that generally attends the transaction of this exchange. The fact is that the man who owns and deposits the money with the Government gets only 2 per cent, while the man who borrows that same money pays 6 or 8 per cent. The institution that acts as the agent of exchange makes more money out of the transaction than the owner of the money. Why not enlarge the scope and usefulness of this Government institution?

This bill, from all appearances, is in the hands of its enemies. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that he does not favor the postal savings bank.

I can not subscribe, Mr. Speaker, to the limit of $500 on which interest shall be paid. Why not take the limit off of the amount of deposit and pay interest on all money placed in the postal savings bank? No man is going to put $1,000 on deposit if he gets interest on only $500.

The tendency and the effect will be to lessen the amount of money deposited in postal savings banks. I would oppose this bill if I had anything better to vote for. It is a sorry disappointment to the country. Many men in the country hoped for greater deposits, even at an increase of interest paid.

The banks would gladly pay 3 per cent for this money, if left on deposit for any length of time. In my State the banks fight for State money, and pay interest on daily balances. And, sir, if the banks will not pay more than the amount of interest suggested by the conference committee, I am certain safe and legitimate avenues for loans can be developed by Government farm-loan banks. The Government owes this to the country. The much-talked-of 30 and 50 year term farm loans are not desired in this country. Five or ten years is long enough in America under our land conditions, and would suit the American farmer.

If I may use the expression, the "psychological" effect of a 30 to 50 year loan would be disquieting to a live American, but the 5 or 10 year term would fit in in connection with the postal savings bank. The Government might loan the money, not to a commercial bank, but to a farm-loan bank. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the administration does not show a disposition to meet the demands of the country.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like first to congratulate the House and the country upon the speedy recovery to full health of our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who appears on the floor to-day.

The present law permits the deposit of $500 in the postal savings bank at interest. The House passed the bill to take off the limit on the amount which could be deposited, but as to the limit of $500 on the amount which could draw interest we raised it to $1,000. The Senate passed the bill making the limit on the amount which could be deposited $1,000, and reduced the limit on the amount to receive interest to $500. You see there was a gradual descent from what the House did. The conferees make the deposit of $1,000 dependent on the will of the trustee.

For myself I am in favor of the position which the House took, taking off the limit on the amount which could be deposited entirely. But I do not criticize the conferees for not having secured an agreement with the Senate conferees to that effect, because the Senate conferees probably are not as enthusiastic for postal savings banks as I am or as the House is, although I think the conferees made a mistake in agreeing to the provision in the form that it is.

Under the existing law the President may at any time invest 30 per cent of the deposits in Government bonds. There was a strong contest in this House when the original postal savings bank bill was passed. The bankers wanted all of the deposits placed in the banks. Many of us wanted to give the Government the power to invest all the funds in Government bonds, and a compromise was finally effected by which the Government might at any time invest 30 per cent in Government bonds and deposit 65 per cent in the banks. I would be in favor of giving the Government the power to invest more than 30 per cent in Government bonds, but this conference report takes away entirely the power of the Government, under ordinary circumstances, to invest one cent in Government bonds.

The existing law permits the President, when public interests require, to invest all of the money in Government bonds; but this bill as now presented only permits any of the money to be invested in Government bonds in case of an exigency.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In case of war or other exigency.

Mr. MANN. In case of war or other exigency. They might just as well have left the "war" out, but an exigency does not mean usual conditions. An exigency does not mean that the President can keep the funds invested in Government bonds. An exigency in the very nature of it is not continuous and can not last. It is only in case of an exigency, and the President must find that there is an exigency involving the credit of the United States before he can invest any of the money in Government bonds. I do not know whether it would be possible to reject the conference report, because we have such a large attendance in the House now for voting purposes, which is not in the House for listening purposes, and even if one could convince all who heard him, he would not win when it came to a vote. If it were possible, it ought to be rejected, and the conferees should go back to conference and secure and preserve the right on the part of the Government to invest a portion of these funds at all times in Government bonds, because the requirement that all of the money in ordinary circumstances shall be invested in the banks is purely in the interest of the banks. They have been fighting for that proposition all of the time. I am not in favor of turning it over to the private banks of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, within the moment allotted to me I can not state more fully than I did when I undertook to interrupt my colleague [Mr. OGLESBY] the reasons why I would advocate that interest be allowed on the entire $1,000, which under the conference agreement may be deposited, and why, in my opinion, a larger sum than $1,000 should not be receivable by the postal savings banks from any individual depositor. So I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is it not in order now to offer an amendment to this report?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to sumbit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand the situation, the House either agrees to the conference report or not. What would be the result if the House failed to agree to the conference report?

The SPEAKER. It would disagree to it.

Mr. HOWARD. Would there be a further conference on the part of the conferees?

The SPEAKER. The House could do what it pleased. It could ask for a further conference, and it could instruct the conferees, and so on.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOON) there were—ayes 97, noes 63.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Nineteen members have risen—not a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the House having refused to order the yeas and nays, is not the conference report adopted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BATHRICK. If the point of order is not withdrawn, will I not get a vote automatically upon this proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BATHRICK. Then I withdraw the point of order that there is no quorum present.

So the conference report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes upon a matter with respect to the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes on a matter pertaining to the business of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the postal savings banks bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the postal savings banks bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. I am afraid the gentleman might tax his strength.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, then I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, through a misunderstanding, for which I am wholly responsible, a request was made to the House that I be excused from attendance upon the House on account of illness. I have not been ill, and the request should not have been submitted to the House. The request was due to a misunderstanding for which I am personally responsible. I left the city on Sunday night for two purposes, one to arrange for the circulation of petitions in my district in order to have my name submitted for nomination upon the Democratic ticket in the coming primary in the State of New York, and the other to attend a Democratic conference at Saratoga, N. Y., which was held in lieu of a State convention. Those were the only reasons for my absence. During my absence the House adopted an order directing the Sergeant at Arms to deduct from a Member's salary, under the law, the pro rata amount due each Member per day, for each day that he is absent. As I do not come within the exceptions made in the order, and as the leave of absence to me was granted by a misunderstanding, there will be no advantage attempted to be taken by me of the order, excusing me from attendance in the House. I thought, perhaps, it proper to make this statement, to avoid any misapprehension or misunderstanding.

Mr. Speaker, since this session of Congress convened in December last I have been absent up to last Sunday night, as nearly as I can estimate up to the present time, 5 legislative days. Two of them were during a period I had intended to include in a week's vacation, starting about 10 days or 2 weeks ago. After I had been absent 2 days I was recalled by an urgent message, because of the European situation requiring action by the Committee on Appropriations on certain legislation. Outside of those 2 days I believe my entire absence from the House since December was for a period of 3 legislative days. I have no apology to make for my absence during the past few days. [Applause.] But I think I voice the somewhat prevailing sentiment in the State of New York when I say that there was some criticism of the action of the House adopting the order which it did adopt at the particular time it adopted it, in view of the fact that the unofficial State convention of the Republican Party had just ended in the State of New York, for which most of the 10 Republican Members of the House had been away for the purpose of attending, while this order was adopted the day preceding the convening of the Democratic conference, at which it was the desire of the 32 Democratic Members from the State of New York to be present. However, so far as I am concerned and the other members of the Democratic delegation from the State of New York are concerned, we have no complaint to make at any action necessary to enforce the attendance of a quorum to transact the business of this House. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the remarks I desired to make were in a measure in the interest of the enforcement of the recent order by the Sergeant at Arms. I renew my request that I may be permitted to speak for not exceeding 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I shall object. Go ahead with your other public business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting correspondence between S. L. May, president of the National Contract Co., of Evansville, Ind., and Lieut. Col. F. R. Shunk, of the Goverment Corps of Engineers, Pittsburgh, Pa., who is in charge of some work on the Ohio River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks leave to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD the correspondence to which he referred.

Mr. MANN. Is there a map in connection with it?

Mr. LIEB. There is no map. This relates to a contract that is now in existence and contains some valuable information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea, asked for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that Mr. SMITH of Arizona had been excused from further service as one of the conferees on the bill (S. 657) to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects in the State of Montana, and for other purposes, and Mr. PITTMAN appointed in his place.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 5198. An act to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Pike National Forest.

CORRECTING ERROR IN H. R. 12045 (PENSION BILL).

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the further consideration of House joint resolution 327, and to pass the same. It is to correct an error in a bill which was passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take up and pass, or to consider, House joint resolution correcting an error in a pension bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 327.

(To correct error in H. R. 12045.)

Whereas by error in printing H. R. 12045, reported by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, act approved July 1, 1914 (Private, No. 50), makes the designation of the military service of one David Taylor, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, to read "Company B, Fourteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry": Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in H. R. 12045, approved July 1, 1914 (Private, No. 50), granting an increase of pension to one David Taylor, be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of David Taylor, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 609 (H. Rept. 1119).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 6357, to authorize the establishment of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department; that there shall be not exceeding two hours' general debate, one-half of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. ADAMSON, and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEVENS. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendations as the committee may make. Whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit: Provided, That the adoption of this resolution shall suspend the operation and effect of H. Res. 536, agreed to August 11, 1914, only and until the final disposition of S. 6357.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes on a matter of interest to the Members, in reference to the condition of manufactures in this country at this time owing to the war abroad, which I think will give some information which Members may desire to convey to their constituents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] if it is his intention to report a rule for the consideration of the war-risks bill this afternoon?

Mr. HENRY. It is; and I am ready to do so now.

Mr. MANN. Is it expected to adopt the rule and pass the bill to-day?

Mr. HENRY. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not willing to stay here until midnight, and I ask that these gentlemen make their requests tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects until to-morrow.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of: Is there a shortage of cattle in the United States?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object to any of these requests until this other matter is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I think it is proper I should explain the terms of the special rule. It provides that immediately upon the adoption of the resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering what is known as the war risks insurance bill. It provides for not exceeding two hours' general debate, to be divided equally between the two sides of the House. Thereupon, the bill is open to amendment and we allow the utmost freedom of debate on those amendments. Whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto, allowing the usual motion, which the rule permits, to recommit the bill, and it supersedes the resolution which was adopted providing for the consideration of the conservation bills only until this resolution is disposed of and the Senate bill which we are to consider is finally decided by the House. Those are the provisions of the special rule. Now, I will yield——

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The rule, I observe, states that the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I would like to know if the committee thinks it means it automatically goes into the Committee of the Whole House or would we have to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. HENRY. I think undoubtedly the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole.

Now, how much time does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] desire?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire 30 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman 30 minutes of my time, and I ask that it be understood that he shall use 30 minutes and I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas yields 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, and reserves the balance of his time, which is 27 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, after I have used five minutes I would like to have it called to my attention.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, provided for in this rule is not a subject for partisan consideration. The world is to-day witnessing the greatest tragedy in human history. The flower of the manhood of Europe is being sacrificed by thousands every day in cruel war. Life is being given up without stint, and in the track of war there is waste of every kind. Widows and orphans are multiplying by thousands, poverty and hardship of every kind are being increased, and there is no prospect of a cessation of the hostilities that make these most deplorable conditions.

The war is not abating; on the contrary those engaged in war are increasing in numbers. The belligerents include practically all the East and a part of the Far East. This is a time for the most serious consideration by the American people and by the American Congress of what they do. There has been no such time in the United States for years.

Mr. Speaker, I read with no satisfaction of the opportunities for extending American trade under these circumstances at this time. If the real cause for the war, of the human slaughter that is daily occurring in Europe, were sought, it would perhaps be found in jealousy because of the extension of the commercial influences of nations. In view of this, it occurs to me that we should proceed most cautiously with the steps that we now take for the extension of the commercial interests of the American people. I take it that no American citizen to-day, no matter how much he may be interested in the extension of our commerce, would take a step that might tend in the remotest degree to involve the American Nation in this almost universal war. Here is the situation: We are the one great Nation of the earth to-day that is neutral, and our neutrality is real. There is no partiality in the United States to-day for any of the belligerents in Europe or Asia. The blood of every nation at war in Europe flows in our veins.

If, then, we extend by affirmative legislation the commerce of our country within the zones heretofore controlled by those now at war, in what light do we stand with those people? That is the first question that suggests itself to me. The second is, that most of the commerce in which we would engage is contraband of war. Our wheat, our corn, our meat of every character, our products of manufacture of almost every variety are, under the London agreement, contraband of war. And both the British and German Governments have so announced to the Secretary of State since this war began.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Thank you, I shall use some more time, Mr. Speaker. Since this war began the London agreement has been accepted by each of those Governments touching contraband of war. Are we not therefore in danger of inviting, not the friendship of the world, but its enmity by taking steps at this time, as we now propose, for extending our commerce? I am anxious for the extension of American commerce, and we have extended it when the world was at peace. But I am fearing that we have not given this subject sufficient consideration. It might have been well—it might be well yet—to have conventions with the belligerent powers and, indeed, to court invitations from these belligerent powers to supply them at this time, when their own industries are prostrated, with the necessities of life. Our State Department has not done this, while two of the belligerents have declared that the products that we propose to take into their markets are contraband of war. These products go upon the high seas at the risk of the shipowner and the owner of the goods. This bill is to guarantee the shipowner and the owner of the goods by the United States. I shall vote for the rule and for the bill, but do so fearing that the administration has taken a step in the wrong direction.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE. This bill is intended to provide a Government guaranty for exports of cotton and grain that shall leave the American shores in foreign bottoms? That is the purpose of it, is it not? It is intended to guarantee exports?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of every character that is contraband of war. Cotton and cotton goods are not contraband of war under the London agreement nor, as I understand, under the announcement made by the British and German nations to the Secretary of State recently.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman this? Cotton and grain are to be protected as war risks under this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL. But cotton does not have to be protected, because it is not contraband of war. The purpose of this bill is to protect contraband of war on the high seas.

Mr. MOORE. Will imports coming into northern ports be protected likewise? Some of them have already been seized and are now in the prize courts.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not a question of protection. It is not a question of insurance. We have not gone so far as to accompany a cargo going out nor to meet a cargo coming in with a man-of-war for the purpose of protecting it.

Mr. MOORE. This is a money protection, as I understand.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is an insurance.

Mr. MOORE. An insurance system that the Government is organizing because, apparently, some private companies are not prepared to take over this kind of business. In other words, the Government is going into the insurance business by reason of the emergency of the war. My question is, In view of the fact that exports of cotton and grain are to be insured, whether those imports coming into northern ports, some of which have already been seized and are now the subject of prize courts, are to be protected by this kind of insurance, and whether the Government stands back of them?

Mr. CAMPBELL. This resolution is to make in order a bill providing for war risks in the transportation, not of cotton and grain alone—it does not have to protect cotton, because cotton is not contraband of war, nor are cotton goods.

Mr. MOORE. But it would be under certain circumstances?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all. It is not so declared by the London agreement nor by the Governments of Great Britain or Germany to our Secretary of State since the war began.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to refer to the language of the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The bill mentions cotton.

Mr. PAYNE. The language of the bill is—

American vessels, their freight and passage moneys, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war, whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

It insures everything shipped in American bottoms.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Or in foreign bottoms, if they come from the United States?

Mr. PAYNE. It says "American bottoms."

Mr. BORLAND. There is nothing about foreign bottoms there.

Mr. BRYAN. It says nothing about foreign bottoms.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The reason for the Government giving the insurance proposed is because the risk is so great that private insurance companies that have heretofore given this insurance are unwilling to issue insurance on such a risk.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman pardon me for just this one interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. We have already voted to take over foreign bottoms and give them American registry. We are about to be called upon to expend $30,000,000 in buying foreign ships.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not the time to yield for anything but a question.

Mr. MOORE. And this is to insure them?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the proposition.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want the gentleman to yield to me at that point, if he will.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BORLAND. I just wanted to know, so that the gentleman might call to the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] section 2, which says this insurance is confined to American vessels. It does not extend to foreign bottoms at all.

Mr. MOORE. We have already provided for that.

Mr. BORLAND. It includes cargoes as well as ships, so that the gentleman's question is fully answered by section 2.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not this proposed legislation offer us a most excellent opportunity to get into a complication with one or more of these foreign powers?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes. That is what I fear. But I am disposed to trust the administration that is responsible to the country at this time for the policies it shall adopt. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas reserves 16 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if he has anyone else who wishes to address the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want 10 minutes, and I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. I do not think I shall need it. I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] is recognized for 10 minutes. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Kansas if he yields back 6 minutes to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No. The gentleman from Texas does not desire it. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the most interesting and eloquent thing I have witnessed during this term of Congress is this exhibition of the ease and facility with which the unwieldy and almost immovable wheels of governmental machinery may be set in motion by the magic power of private profits. The boasted checks and balances of our governmental system which were guaranteed by the founders as ample safeguards against hasty and ill-considered action, and which have served mainly to prevent the passage of humanitarian measures, are like gossamer strands before this urgent demand that certain property interests be insured from possible loss.

The magic power here evidenced is truly wonderful. Everything gives way before it. The bill provided for in this rule is in direct opposition to the fundamental ideas of the majority of the Members of this House. They believe that the Government should keep entirely out of the realm of business which they consider private business, but this measure puts the Government in the insurance business, which they regard as a purely private function.

I confess that I do not hold that view. I do not believe that the Government should keep its hands off everything except the preservation of peace and the maintenance of order. I am in favor of the Government putting its hands on everything where such action means the welfare of all the people.

But I call attention to the fact that the remarkable power which declares that this measure is absolutely necessary is able, first of all, to overcome the fundamental views of the very men whose votes will assure its enactment.

But that is not all, for still other difficulties have been overcome. Every cog and wheel of governmental machinery have been set to whirring with precision at a moment's notice. The Treasury Department has prepared the bill; it has been introduced and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; hearings have been held and the testimony printed; a favorable report has been made; the bill has been placed on the calendar ready for consideration.

Still that is not all. The Rules Committee for two months has been a cavern with an immovable stone before its entrance, and no frenzied plea or frantic demand has caused a tremor in its obstructing security. But this measure was the "open sesame" of more than Arabian Nights power, and before it the rock moved aside and an instant entrance was effected. Supporters of woman's suffrage and other measures now on the calendars have tried for months without avail to accomplish what has been done in a moment on behalf of this war-risk insurance bill.

What is the power that is able to work these transformations and revolutions? I find the answer in the report of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Mr. Kirlin, of New York City, is testifying and giving the reason for immediate action. He says:

> I shall not claim much time in the discussion of the question of the sufficiency of the American market to take care of this insurance, for the reason that 62 gentlemen who assembled in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and who represented the chambers of commerce, clearing-house committees, and some shipping organizations all through the West and South, as well as the East, told the Secretary that they could not get their risks insured, as a practical matter, upon any terms that would enable them to sell their products.

When the chairman of the committee asked Mr. Seth Low, of New York City, the chairman of the conference that appeared before the committee, as to what would be the result in the future, Mr. Low said:

> I think the ships will come under the American flag with the ship-registry bill you have passed and with this bill, if it is enacted into law, and the President, of course, under the ship-registry bill has the authority to suspend some features of the navigation laws which at present are very embarrassing. I am not able to say that our American ships will permanently stay under our flag, unless the competition is made even and we are free from all disabilities. If we are, I think you can believe that American energy and American enterprise will keep our ships under our flag.

The chairman, Mr. ADAMSON, then asked:

> They will stay under our flag if the business pays, and if it does not they will not?

Mr. Low answered, "That is it exactly."

Here, then, is the answer. The magic power which starts the governmental wheels of machinery to work under such an emergency as this is the demand for the guaranty of private profits.

I am not saying that no emergency confronts us, nor am I saying that the different steps taken in the rapid consideration of this bill are not justified. But I do declare that this exhibition of what can be done should be an inspiration to those who see in less lurid events and conditions than the war in Europe the presence of an emergency and the need of prompt governmental action.

This is a war-risk insurance bill, and its entire purpose is to protect cargoes of American products shipped on the high seas. It is a dollar-and-cent proposition, and its entire appeal is from that standpoint. What will it do? The testimony before the committee is that its passage will mean that some 200 vessels will be brought under the American flag to take advantage of its provisions. The testimony further shows that the average cargo is valued at $1,500,000. Taking it for granted that these 200 vessels, containing cargoes of that value, will be insured against war risks by the Government under this bill, taking it further for granted that each and every one of the vessels are captured and their cargoes confiscated, the total loss would amount to $300,000,000. These are fanciful suppositions, but we may take them as the very maximum of possible loss.

Early in this term I introduced a measure providing for a social insurance commission. Its purpose is to secure collective action in insuring against accidents, sickness, unemployment—misfortunes which affect the whole Nation as well as the particular individuals who suffer directly. On August 1, 1913, in a speech in the House I urged action, and said:

> The duty of defining the responsibility in each of these sources of waste must rest with Government. Voluntary action has not and can not meet the problems and deal with them. Social and industrial justice will never come voluntarily from great corporations. None of the great combinations of capital, engaged in vast industrial enterprises, will uphold justice when it lessens the golden stream into the strong box. Of the few and halting steps made by certain corporations, and which are pointed out by the forces of reaction as seven-league strides, not one but has been a frankly avowed attempt to increase earnings and dividends.
> It requires a power greater than business and industry, a power that represents the interests of all classes, to define justice and to maintain it, and that power in this Nation can be nothing save the power of the people's Government.

Since the day I uttered those words more than 100,000 Americans have given up their lives in accidents on railroads, in mines, and mills, and in the myriad of ways which make up the carnage of peace. Five hundred thousand Americans have been seriously injured at their daily work, with the uncounted toll such accidents levy upon dependent ones. The cost of such a toll in dollars and cents can only be measured approximately, but George E. McNeill, of the International Underwriters' Association of America has evolved a system of computation which, if followed out, would indicate that the annual loss of earnings alone to the workers of this Nation through accidents is $350,000,000. That is a greater loss than all the cargoes of all the ships planned for under this bill. Why should not such a loss, occurring every year, be recognized as an emergency which would set all the wheels of governmental machinery into motion?

Sickness and unemployment cause even greater loss. One million two hundred thousand persons between the ages of 20 and 65 have been continuously ill during the past twelvemonth. Figuring their earnings at the average yearly income of all wage earners, $435, the direct dollar-and-cent loss would be $500,000,000 and more. Unemployment during the most prosperous times affects one out of every five wage earners, and the loss in earnings from that source alone every year approaches $900,000,000. Why is not such a ruthless waste sufficient to stir governmental action as quickly as a threatened loss on the high seas?

I believe the passage of this war-risk insurance bill will hasten the passage of a social-insurance measure. I believe that the people will realize that if it is advisable to take collective action to insure cargoes against loss it is far more advisable to take collective action to insure justice and equity and a fair chance to human beings. It may seem a far cry from this step to the one advocated in my bill for social insurance, but the trend is the same. Even the emergencies which come upon us by chance and without direction may lead to action which should rightfully have been taken long ago. It is to be regretted that statesmen allow such vital action to be taken only in emergency and do not seek to control and direct a logical trend toward justice and the protection of human rights as well as property rights.

I believe that this admission on the part of great private concerns that they can not perform the task that confronts them and must have the helping hand of Government is something well worth noting by every American. These interests do not cry out against paternalistic action when the benefits come to them. It should be the part of Congress to see that this function once undertaken be continued. The Government should not take all the risk during such times as these and then when the hazards are over turn the insurance back to those who retreated in time of danger and stress. The Government can continue this business permanently and efficiently, as it does the parcel post, and in a way to promote the welfare of the American people.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have not time to yield. I have only a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I believe that out of this remarkable exhibition of governmental celerity will come something that will be still more eloquent. We will see that if it is possible to set all the machinery into motion—if it is possible to turn completely from theorizing to action, on the ground of emergency which endangers private profit—it is possible and advisable to do all this for the sake of the human interests of this Nation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the purposes of the bill for the immediate consideration of which the rule is offered must be obvious to the membership of this House. It is an emergency measure, and the existing war conditions call for the immediate passage of the bill. I congratulate the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], my colleague on the Rules Committee, for his patriotic expressions and his fair statement that there is no partisanship or politics in the measure. Our cotton, wheat, corn, and other products are awaiting shipment to the other side, yet private companies and private capital will not or can not adequately undertake to insure the cargoes against the risks that are now, in view of the European war, incident upon the sea.

It is proposed that our Government's undertaking to insure against war risks is to be only temporary and to meet the present emergency. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] suggested that the bill and the insurance it contemplates was in the interest of private capital. In this he is, I feel certain, seriously mistaken. If private capital can not or will not undertake to insure against these war risks—and they surely are great and many—why should the Government hesitate to lend its aid in the effort to transport our products across the sea and thus expand our commerce, promote our trade, facilitate our business interests, and bring back to our land gold for our commodities?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have not time now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] inadvertently, I think, said this bill was intended to effect insurance upon contraband of war, among other things. I desire to correct that statement. The gentleman in making it was in error. The insurance is not to be on contraband goods. It is to be against loss or damage of American vessels, their freight, passage moneys, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein.

We all keenly appreciate and deplore the awful and terrible conditions that have arisen out of the war. Let us here who happily dwell in peace do whatever lies in our power to relieve our people from the stagnating effects the war may have upon our international commerce and our trade abroad. The measure proposed will to a great extent meet a most pressing need. The conference that recently met to consider this problem of war-risk insurance was composed of some of the most representative and best-informed men in the business, commercial, and financial world. They have approved the system which the bill provides. I am indeed glad that the administration favors the immediate passage of the bill, and it seems to me that every consideration of American patriotism, every consideration of business interest and necessity, every earnest desire to benefit our people by promoting trade and commercial activity, should move the Members of this House, without a dissenting vote, to pass the rule.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill is needed by the country, whether we regard it from the narrower standpoint of the necessity for an outlet of our own trade and the extension of a market for our own products, in view of the present condition abroad, or whether we regard it from the broader standpoint of humanity—that of the need of foreign nations for those products. To me commerce is reciprocal in its beneficence. I have never seen the sinister phase of commerce that the gentlemen here have referred to.

I congratulate the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] on some of the broad sentiments expressed in his speech and upon his determination to support the measure, but I realize that he does it feeling that under the doctrine of the party in which he is such a conspicuous member the extension of the American trade is not a desirable thing; that we ought, for some reason or other, to include America in some sort of a Chinese wall. I also sympathize with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] in his desire to extend the benefits of governmental activity to the wage-earning class; and yet I can not agree with the doctrines of his party, if they are the doctrines, that a profit made by American business men is necessarily and inherently sinister. I do believe in the doctrine of the Democratic Party and the Democratic administration—that the thing for Congress to do in this emergency is to set American business free, and that is what we are trying to do in this bill.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman favors the proposition for war-risk insurance?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Would you continue it in case it works well beyond the time of the war?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not at all sure but that I would.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. After the emergency is over, if it does the business more efficiently than the private interests would do it, would the gentleman continue it?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not at all certain but that I would, although I have not considered the question. To-day we are confronted with cargoes of American products waiting in the harbors to set sail for places where the world needs those products. When we say that this measure sets commerce free we mean not only men who stand at the head of the commercial interests of the world, but every honest producer and wage earner. The producer whose labor has entered into these great products is under the protection of this bill. Commerce is widespread in its beneficial interests. It is universal in its ramifications. Every man who takes a dinner pail and goes to a factory and puts in eight hours' work is entering into commerce and creating the material wealth of the world. Every farmer who produces a crop is entering into commerce, and this measure is for the benefit of all. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yielded four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I am frank to confess that I have serious misgivings regarding this legislation. I am not quite sure whether if this bill is put upon the statute books it will not indirectly involve us in the danger of violating our neutrality, and for this reason: Of course I am in favor of extending and expanding American trade, but it is questionable in my mind whether that extension should be had at the risk of jeopardizing our neutral position, and whether it will be a beneficial thing if we know in advance that the bill would have a one-sided or partial effect. I am quite certain that these American ships which are to carry our grain and cotton to Europe will land exclusively in British ports. They will, of course, make the excuse that the channel being mined and the North Sea being mined they could not proceed any farther than British ports. Consequently this extension of the American trade must result in succor to belligerent nations and only the belligerents on one side, and not on the other. It will benefit England and France to the exclusion of Germany and Austria. I merely wish to submit these considerations to the careful thought of the House.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that for a hundred years American diplomacy has tried to secure immunity of private property at sea in time of war. At every peace conference we have iterated and reiterated our position in favor of such immunity. Is it not strange, Mr. Speaker, that not a word is said in the newspapers how necessary such immunity is to-day? The only nation on the globe which has prevented an international agreement in favor of immunity of private property at sea is Great Britain. She has contended for a continuation of the piracy which, unfortunately, is now the rule in the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No; I have only a few minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am not in error. The United States Government has gone on record for a hundred years in favor of it. At the first and the second Hague conferences our delegates demanded an agreement in reference to the immunity of private property at sea in time of war, and all other nations were willing to join hands with us. England prevented that agreement.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I had the honor to be a delegate with my colleague from Missouri; and I want to verify the statement that he is now making in regard to the conference at The Hague. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from New Jersey for affirming my statement. Again I call attention to the fact that these ships sailing under the American flag will under no circumstances be able to reach Germany or Austria, and the practical effect of this legislation will simply be to feed England.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman did not intend to criticize any of the belligerents in the troubles now going on over on the European Continent. If he did so, I regret very much that he saw fit to go that far.

Mr. Speaker, in this great crisis of the world it is properly and entirely wise, I think, that we should pass this emergency bill, and in view of what has been said here I do not think I can better state the purpose of the bill that is to be considered after the resolution is adopted than to read several lines from the splendid report accompanying the bill. This report is lucid, strong, and, I think, a most convincing document, and I read this part of it:

> This bill is rendered necessary by reason of conditions arising from the state of warfare existing among different nations at the present time. It is an emergency measure to continue in force only so long as the emergency exists. It creates in the Treasury Department a bureau of war-risk insurance for the purpose of insuring American ships and cargoes shipped therein against loss or damage by the risks of war.
> A conference called by the Secretary of the Treasury to consider the grain export and the foreign exchange and shipping situation met in the Treasury Department August 14, 1914, with 62 representatives of business, trade, shipping, and banking attending. It was the consensus of opinion at the conference that one of the pressing questions of the present time was the provision of means for transporting grain, cotton, and other merchandise abroad and war-risk insurance.
> The enlarged registry of American ships and action by the Government supplementing what private companies might be able to do in connection with insurance would rapidly solve the question of exports of grain and cotton and of foreign exchange. Foreign exchange, it was declared, will find its equilibrium when the United States gets the ships and moves the grain. To illustrate the pressing need, representatives at the conference called attention to the congestion of American grain and other staples at the seaports and in the interior awaiting transportation. It was pointed out that Great Britain, France, and Belgium are now insuring the vessels and cargoes flying their respective flags against war risks.

That states the case, and I believe that the emergency calls for action, and that this bill should be speedily passed. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUTLER) there were—ayes 114, noes 2.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 6357, the war-risk insurance bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 6357, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the author of the House bill, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], such part of 20 minutes as he desires to use.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the conditions confronting us at this time grow out of the war in Europe. We have had no agency in creating the conditions, but we are the victims of the war in Europe. Many emergencies have arisen, and will continue to arise while this war is in progress, that may demand emergency legislation on the part of Congress. It would be a reproach to our form of government if there were a lack of power in the Government to frame legislation to meet these emergencies. This same committee of 62 business men, representing the commercial, shipping, and banking interests of the country, to which attention has been called, came to Washington and urged the passage of the ship-registry bill, admitting foreign-built ships to be registered under the American flag for the foreign trade. It is a matter of common knowledge that about 92 per cent of our commerce has been for many years past carried in foreign ships, and the most of it in ships belonging to the belligerent nations, Great Britain being our principal carrier. When war ensued in Europe the German ships, the British ships, the French ships, and those of other maritime nations in Europe now engaged in war, with some few exceptions, were compelled to suspend operations. The result has been a paralysis of our foreign commerce. It has been said that we should exercise caution; that we should avoid international complications; that we should be careful to observe the laws of neutrality. I thoroughly agree with those who express that opinion; but in view of the fact that in the past 92 per cent of our foreign commerce has been carried in foreign ships, and the merchant ships of other nations now involved in war are no longer available for our commercial purposes, emphasis is given to the necessity for us to provide a merchant marine of our own.

In years past we were content to let the merchant marine of foreign nations carry our commerce, although many thoughtful men knew the time would come when it would be necessary for us to have a merchant marine of our own, and this present crisis only emphasizes the great importance of our providing a merchant marine for ourselves in peace, if we would meet and provide for such emergencies as confront us at the present time. It is an object lesson to the American people that should not be forgotten as soon as the present emergency passes. We are the victims of conditions in Europe, and, as I said, without any fault of our own. It was thought by some that if we passed the shipping bill American capital would invest in foreign ships and bring them under our flag and meet present conditions and open up the way for our commerce in the foreign trade. Capital is always timid; it is not inclined ever to take any unnecessary risks. No sooner had we passed the ship-registry bill than the same gentlemen—and, I think, with much reason, in view of the action of the belligerent nations in Europe in undertaking to carry the war risk on their own vessels—insisted that Congress should pass an act authorizing the Government to carry the war risk on vessels under the American flag and their cargoes. It was urged that a bureau of war-risk insurance be created in the Treasury Department or some other department of the Government to carry the war risk on vessels under our flag.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. I noticed in the registry bill that the term "foreign-built ships" is used. I notice in section 2 of the bill under consideration the expression is used, "make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels." Does the gentleman not think that is somewhat ambiguous and that it would be better to use an expression something like this: "Vessels which properly and legally fly the American flag"? Otherwise it might be confined to American-built ships or vessels owned by Americans, strictly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it is necessary to do that, for if they are American vessels they must be vessels registered under the law of the United States. If I were to use technical language, I would have said "vessels of the United States," but I think the term is sufficiently clear and is free from any ambiguity. If they are American vessels, they can be such only if they are registered under the laws of the United States, and that would include American-built vessels and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act that we have recently passed.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly appreciate the hard labor the gentleman from Missouri has put in on these ship bills. I do not think any man in the House has worked harder to inform himself on these important questions. In view of his address supporting the bill giving American registry to foreign-built ships, and the statement he has just made with regard to the decline of the American merchant marine and the desirability of reconstructing it, I should like to ask the gentleman whether, as a matter of fact, we are not now entering upon a brand-new plan of upbuilding the American merchant marine in the guise of an emergency, a plan first advanced in the bill to purchase foreign bottoms and now followed up by the suggestion of a Government guaranty that those who do business in these bottoms will not suffer loss, which is to be followed by a third step—the advance of $30,000,000 for the purchase of vessels to establish a merchant marine?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say not, so far as this bill is concerned. I do not regard it as part of any general plan to build up the American merchant marine. It is an emergency measure, pure and simple. I am in favor of having the bureau abolished just as soon as the emergency has passed. I am not in favor of this bureau of war-risk insurance becoming a permanent bureau. I am not in favor at this time of the Government entering into the marine insurance business, and the bill expressly states that it is an emergency matter, and just as soon as the emergency passes the President has the authority to suspend further operations of this bureau.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think that if this emergency board were created solely as a war-emergency measure the necessity for it would pass away at a time when, under the plan contemplated by these new bills, the American merchant marine would have actually been started under the new system?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If I understand the gentleman, he has the idea that if this bureau is created in the Treasury Department that its functions can be exercised in peace as well as in war. Through the bureau to be created the Government is authorized to issue war-risk policies. They will be issued, of course, upon war risks, and there will be no occasion for the existence of the bureau or the exercise of its functions except in time of war, so that even if this law should remain in force, or if this bureau should continue in existence, there would be no occasion for the exercise of its functions. Hence, I am in favor of abolishing the board when it has finished its work, and stop the expense in time of peace. It may be brought to life again if conditions should arise similar to those existing at the present time and to serve a like purpose.

Mr. MOORE. In view of the very important conferences in which the gentleman has taken part, will he state if these three bills that we have been called upon to consider are really a part of a policy to rehabilitate the merchant marine, that policy being based upon the alleged emergency which has arisen?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say this bill is no part of any such policy at all. It is to meet an emergency now existing and has no other purpose whatever. Speaking for myself, I do not hesitate to say it is no part of any policy I have in mind to rehabilitate our merchant marine.

Mr. MOORE. Has the gentleman given consideration to the years it may take to adjust differences that may arise as the result of the passage of this bill following the seizure of American cargoes?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I presume if any questions arise as to the liability of the Government in event of loss or damage, those questions will be settled by the bureau, or in event of disagreement, through the courts or in some other way, and it may take years to determine the liability of the Government, but that will not occasion the continuation of the functions of this bureau. So the gentleman from Pennsylvania need not regard that matter seriously in weighing the merits of this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Missouri, on the topic being considered by him, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make clear to the members of the committee that there is no intention or purpose to insure any risk on the ordinary perils of the sea but absolutely the casualties of war only.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That ought to be clear to anybody who has read the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman permit just one question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield.

Mr. GOULDEN. What proportion of the 92 per cent of foreign vessels carrying our goods up to this time are owned by American citizens, either in part or whole, or by corporations controlled by our people?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is impossible to state.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman give an estimate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the investigation of the so-called Shipping Trust by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Franklin, of the International Merchant Marine, testified, as I now recall, that about $100,000,000 of American capital was invested in foreign ships.

Mr. GOULDEN. That would be in the neighborhood of 40 or 50 per cent, I take it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, I would not say that. I would not undertake to say how much money is invested in the merchant marine of the maritime nations of Europe.

Mr. GOULDEN. About that, I should imagine.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will, with pleasure, to my colleague.

Mr. BOOHER. Is it the intention of this bill that goods may be bought by foreign Governments through their agents in this country and placed in American ships and those Governments insure those goods?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say it is not the purpose of this bill to authorize our Government to carry the war risk on goods consigned to a foreign Government.

Mr. BOOHER. There is no provision in this bill exempting them. It says all goods shipped in American vessels. Then we would give foreign Governments the right to buy a cargo of goods here—wheat or corn, or whatever it might be—and put it in an American vessel, and then the Government insures it under this bill, as I read it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If one of the belligerents in Europe should buy wheat, corn, or other goods in this country, it would hardly be expected that our Government would insure the war risk on the commodities. I have the regulations which were reported by a committee in England appointed by the Government suggesting the rules for war-risk insurance to be assumed by the British Government, which I am going to put in the RECORD. I assume—just let me answer the question—that our Government will not take a war risk on any contraband of war, much less assume the war risk on cargoes consigned to the Government of any of the belligerents.
